

THE POETIC EDDA

VOLUME II
MYTHOLOGICAL POEMS

Edited with Translation
Introduction and Commentary by URSULA DRONKE

819.1
Edd

THE POETIC EDDA

VOLUME II
MYTHOLOGICAL POEMS

*Edited with Translation
Introduction and Commentary by*
URSULA DRONKE

Y. L.

CLARENDON PRESS · OXFORD
1997

Oxford University Press, Great Clarendon Street, Oxford OX2 6DP Oxford New York

*Athens Auckland Bangkok Bogota Bombay Buenos Aires Calcutta Cape Town Dar es Salaam
Delhi Florence Hong Kong Istanbul Karachi
Kuala Lumpur Madras Madrid Melbourne
Mexico City Nairobi Paris Singapore Taipei Tokyo Toronto and associated companies in Berlin Ibadan*

Oxford is a trade mark of Oxford University Press

Published in the United States by Oxford University Press Inc., New York

© Oxford University Press 1997

*All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press.
Within the UK, exceptions are allowed in respect of any fair dealing for the purpose of research or private study, or criticism or review, as permitted under the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act, 1988, or in the case of reprographic reproduction in accordance with the terms of the licenses issued by the Copyright Licensing Agency. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside these terms and in other countries should be sent to the Rights Department, Oxford University Press, at the address above*

*British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Data available*

*Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Data available*

ISBN 0-19-811181-9

1 3 5 7 9 10 8 6 4 2

Typeset by Joshua Associates Ltd., Oxford Printed in Great Britain on acid-free paper by Bookcraft Ltd., Midsomer Norton, Somerset

For my daughter

PREFACE

As the main poems in this volume I have chosen five which are among the greatest of Norse poems and which all relate in some way to the period from the ninth to the eleventh century, when Norsemen were in most familiar contact with the Irish and the Anglo-Saxons. Assimilation of distinct traditions from these neighbour nations is most marked; at the same time all five poems share a mature affinity of style from being conserved as living poetry for two centuries in Iceland. The purpose of this edition is literary: to open up for the common reader the delights of the complexities and felicities of the poems and the beauty of the language, and to show the poets' intellectual command of their themes, mythological, religious, and human. To this end I have tackled in commentary and discussion many problems which I know it is not in my competence to solve, in the hope that other scholars may be able to.

The five sections relating to the main poems are each introduced by a detailed table of contents, to clear the approach for the reader. Inevitably the section for Völuspá is the most intricate of all, as it is the most intricate of poems. Text and translation of Baldur's Draumar are given as an Appendix to Völuspá.

Volumes III and IV are already well advanced in their preparation. I am fortunate and delighted to have the counsel of Professor Ingeborg Glier in presenting the Sigurðr poems in relation to German tradition in Volume III, and of Dr Clive Tolley, who will be co-editor with me of the second collection of mythological poems in Volume IV.

Volume I is to be reprinted with corrections and bibliographical updating.

I owe a very great debt to many people for the enlightenment their work has given me and for their ready advice. Peter Dronke's deep interest and knowledge in so many fields, literary, artistic, philosophical, have been a constant source of orientation for me when I might otherwise have been lost in the wealth of ideas presented by these Eddic poems. Many other learned friends have advised me and answered my questions with unfailing kindness. For their warm letters from Iceland, bringing news of new scholarship, I am particularly indebted to Guðrún Helgadóttir, Sverrir Tómasson, Stefán Karlsson. Friends on the Continent have kept me in touch with their work: Kurt Schier, Klaus von See, Gerd Weber, Hubert Seelow, Wilhelm Heizmann, Folke Ström, Lars Lönnroth, Jonna Louis-Jensen. The work of Margaret Clunies Ross has been a great stimulus to me, in its vital originality. I have benefited much from the insight and wit of Roberta Frank. I am deeply indebted to Sukumari Bhattacharji for her guidance on Indian sources and the generous gift of her writings; I remember with delight her swift mind and rare learning in discussion in Oxford and her cordial hospitality in Calcutta. Closer to home I have even longer debts: to Joan Turville-Petre, Peter Foote, Brian and Guðrún Dodsworth, Michael Lapidge, David Dumville, Thomas Charles-Edwards, Sebastian Brock, Arthur Hatto, Michael Barnes, Olive Sayce, Nigel Palmer, Lotte Motz, Erich Poppe, Jacqueline Simpson, for readily giving me their expert advice. For the benefits of their scholarly companionship over many years and for the freshness of vision in their researches, to which frequent acknowledgement is made in this volume, I have many younger scholars to thank, especially Heather O'Donoghue, Diana Whaley, Alison Finlay, Daphne Davidson, Susan Blackall, John Hines, Guðrún Nordal, Carolyne Larrington, Ian Graham, John Enoch, Alan Davey, Peter Robinson, Andy Orchard, Ian Shiels. I thank Richard North for many stimulating suggestions and interpretations. To Clive Tolley I owe a special debt of thanks for his great help in presenting Volume II. He has organized the very complex script for the printer and watched over its accuracy with impeccable scholarship; specific ideas that are his are marked CT. What flaws remain are all mine. The value of Tolley's own mythological researches for the content of the volume will be evident from the frequent reference to his writings in the course of discussion.

The work on Rígsþula is dedicated to Gesche Kähler and the late Martin Dreher, who first asked to read the poem with me in Munich in 1973.

U.D.

Cambridge
June, 1996

CONTENTS

PREFACE	vii
LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS	x
THE MANUSCRIPTS	xi
THE PRINTED TEXT	xii
Symbols Used in the Texts	xiii
ABBREVIATIONS	xiv
VQLUSPÁ
Contents	3
Text and Translation	7
Introduction	25
Commentary on the Text	105
Appendix: Baldurs Draumar Text, Translation, and Commentary	154
RÍGSÞULA
Contents	161
Text and Translation	162
Introduction	174
Commentary on the Text	215
VQLUNDARKVIÐA
Contents	241
Text and Translation	243
Introduction	255
Commentary on the Text	301
Index of Personal Names	327
LOKASENNA
Contents	331
Text and Translation	332
Introduction	349
Commentary on the Text	356

SKÍRNISMÁL

Contents	375
Text and Translation	376
Introduction	386
Commentary on the Text	404

BIBLIOGRAPHY

415

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

The Franks Casket, front panel. Scene in Weland's smithy	frontispiece
The Franks Casket, front panel. Weland and the Magi	283

THE MANUSCRIPTS

THE four heroic poems edited in Volume I are preserved only in the Codex Regius (R), written in Iceland c. 1270. Four of the mythological poems edited in Volume II are also preserved in that MS: Völuspá, Völundarkviða, Skírnismál, and Lokasenna. A short description of R and its history is given in Volume I. xi–xiii (R is there referred to as CR).

A variant version of Völuspá is preserved on two leaves (H) inserted into an early fourteenth century Icelandic MS., Hauksbók. On the dating of these two leaves see Völuspá Introduction III. A.

Two thirds of the text of Völuspá can be found either cited or rendered in prose in Snorri Sturluson's Gylfaginning, of which there are four main MSS., listed in Völuspá Introduction III. A, where the relationship of the variant texts of the poem is examined in detail. For a most helpful and lucid account of the SnE MSS. see Faulkes (b), xxix–xxxiii; see also G. Lorenz I–8 for further documentation.

A fragmentary MS., written in Iceland between 1300 and 1325, AM 748 I 4^{to} (A), contains on six of its surviving twenty-eight leaves three entire Eddic poems, Baldrs Draumar, Grimnismál, Hymiskviða, and parts of four others, Hárbarðsljóð, Skírnismál, Vafþrúðnismál, and Völundarkviða. The first twenty-seven stanzas of Skírnismál occur in A. Comparison of the two texts of these stanzas is given in Skírnismál Introduction IV. Only a few lines of the prose prologue of Völundarkviða are preserved in A at the end of the sixth leaf, when a lacuna begins.¹

Rígsþula is preserved, with a beginning and middle, but without an ending, only on two sides of a single leaf in the Codex Wormianus, one of the main MSS. of the Snorra Edda, from c. 1350 or somewhat later (see Völuspá Introduction III. A). The problems of the text and the lost ending are discussed in Rígsþula Introduction II. A and I. B, and commentary to 49/1.

Facsimile editions and transcriptions of the MSS. used in the present edition are listed at the beginning of the Bibliography.

¹ In both R and A Vkv appears to be considered a mythological rather than a heroic poem, in R preceded by Prym and followed by Alv, in A preceded by Hym. That Vkv may have been commonly copied in collections of mythological poems would account for the fact that palaeographically Vkv is closer to the mythological poems than to the heroic (Lindblad 261–2).

THE PRINTED TEXT

I HAVE made some small changes to the printing procedures in Volume I:

1. I have kept abbreviations for MSS. (e.g. R, H) in roman type on all occurrences; SnE (roman) means 'the MS(S). of Snorri's Edda', SnE (italics) refers to the edition of Finnur Jónsson.

2. For Völuspá I have used a different method of presenting textual variants, placing the SnE variants separately below those of R and H, to make the textual relationships clearer.

3. To the notes in Volume I. xiv–xv on the spellings of consonants in R, I would now add reference to the frequency with which 'N' is used for n (and not, as more conventionally, for nn): e.g. mōran (for mæran, Vsp 2/7), leikin (Vsp 22/6), folgin (Vsp 31/4), matkan (Vsp 57/4), vana (Skm 18/3). In Vsp 26/2 the reverse is also seen, where single 'n' stands for nn/N: þrungin. I have not noted such spellings among the variants unless a problem of interpretation is involved. See JH I. xi–xiv.

4. MS. abbreviations are expanded using superscript characters in the citation of MS. forms; MS. macrons and ampersands are retained in the citations. Fine distinctions (such as the variant forms of r) are not maintained, however; for these, the facsimile editions and transcriptions listed in the Bibliography should be consulted. MS. forms are enclosed in single speech marks when it is clearer so to distinguish them.

5. The spelling of ON personal names and place names has been normalized in discussion and commentary, when the names are not italicized (as in citation of the ON text), e.g. Freyja / Freyia, Gefjun / Gefion, Járnsviðr / Járnviðr.

6. When citing in discussion from a diplomatic text (such as SnE) I have normalized the spelling, unless there was reason not to do so.

7. I have introduced long vowel marks in italicized citations of OE, OHG, and OS words to make philological argument and comparisons with ON clearer. In the occasional citations of Sanskrit words, drawn from printed texts of varied styles, I have standardized OUP accentuation, as in for example W. D. O'Flaherty's Asceticism and Eroticism in the Mythology of Śiva, 1973.

8. I have used cross-references to sections and subsections rather than to pages. The general table of contents at the beginning of the volume refers to the fuller indexes of contents that precede the individual poems and provide page references to the sections and subsections of the discussion.

9. In the case of three poems, Völuspá, Völundarkviða, Skírnismál, I have traced the sequence of ideas, or actions, in the Introduction, noting the relevant stanza in the margin, and referring to this stanza as 'ad loc.' in subsequent discussion. In the case of Rígsþula and Lokasenna the same procedure is not so fitting and I have not used it.

10. Bibliographical references have been kept as brief as possible. The Bibliography at the end of the volume contains full details of all works cited; in the main text, references are confined to the author's surname (with initials if necessary), or to the title of the work cited, as appropriate, followed by the volume number and the page reference. Different works by one author are identified as (a), (b), etc., and are so listed in the Bibliography. The most commonly cited authors and works are abbreviated still further; the abbreviations are included in the Bibliography. Norse and other medieval works are generally listed by their titles, even when the author is known.

Symbols used in the texts

Italics indicate emendation, or MS. rubrics.

- [] enclose letters or lines that are not in the MS, but are supplied by conjecture or by analogy with the practice of the text elsewhere, or from another MS.
- † † enclose text in the edited version transferred from another place in the MS.
- ˘ ˘ enclose text in the textual notes written above the line in the MS.
- ‡ ‡ enclose text as yet uninterpreted.
- ° indicates an editorial omission from the text of the MS., where the omission alters the sense (other omissions, usually erroneous scribal repetitions or anticipations of the text, are noted in the textual notes only).

A line of dots indicates that one or more lines are omitted in the MS.

Smaller type indicates lines not considered by the editor to be part of the poet's original text. MSS. make varied use of capital letters: in R, a large capital marks the beginning of a poem, and of a preceding prose prologue. Marginal capitals are used sporadically; these are noted in the textual notes. A capital is used, within the continuous text, to mark the beginning of a stanza (or, in the prose, of a sentence): these capitals, and their absence, are noted in this edition only when they do not correspond with the beginnings of stanzas (or sentences) as printed here.

ABBREVIATIONS

Abbreviations of a purely bibliographical nature, and abbreviations for Eddic poems, will be found in the Bibliography. Manuscripts are listed at the beginning of the Bibliography.

acc.	accusative	neut.	neuter
adj.	adjective	no.	number
adv.	adverb	nom.	nominative
AM	Arnarnagnaean	n.p.	no place
c.	century	Norw	Norwegian
c.	circa	OE	Old English
ch.	chapter	OF	Old French
col.	column	OHG	Old High German
conj.	conjunction	OIcel	Old Icelandic
Dan	Danish	om.	omitted
dat.	dative	ON	Old Norse
ed.	edited by	ONorw	Old Norwegian
edn.	edition	OS	Old Saxon
esp.	especially	OSwed	Old Swedish
f.	following	p.	page
fem.	feminine	part.	participle
Fig.	figure	PE	Poetic Edda
fol.	folio	prep.	preposition
gen.	genitive	pret.	preterite
Gmc	Germanic	pl.	plural
hap. leg.	hapax legomenon, i.e. 'only occurrence'	pres.	present
IE	Indo-European	pron.	pronoun
indic.	indicative	repr.	reprinted
Introd	Introduction	rev.	revised by
l.	lege, i.e. 'read'	s.a.	sub anno, 'under the year'
Lat	Latin	sb.	substantive
lit.	literally	sc.	scilicet, 'namely'
masc.	masculine	sg.	singular
ME	Middle English	Skr	Sanskrit
MHG	Middle High German	Suppl.	Supplement
ModE	Modern English	s.v.	sub voce, 'under the word'
ModIcel	Modern Icelandic	trans.	translated by/translation
ModNorw	Modern Norwegian	v.	verse, versus
MS.	manuscript	vb.	verb
n.	note	v.l.	varia lectio, 'variant reading'
n.d.	no date	vol.	volume

VQLUSPÁ

CONTENTS

TEXT AND TRANSLATION	7
INTRODUCTION	25
I. The Structure of the Poem	25
A. The grand architecture of Völuspá (1 – 20, 43 – 62)	25
B. The progress to Ragnarøk (21 – 42)	26
C. The sibylline voices	27
II. The Sequence of Ideas: A Reading of the Poem in the Codex Regius Text	30
A. Prologue: the völva's authority (1 – 2)	30
B. The establishment of the cosmos (3 – 20)	32
1. The beginnings (3 – 4/4)	32
2. Sun and moon and the establishment of time (4/5 – 6)	35
3. The gods and the refrain of power (6, cf. 9, 23, 25)	37
4. The golden age (7 – 8)	37
5. Gold-mining dwarfs (9)	38
6. An interpolation and lacuna in the text (10 – 16)	38
7. The first man and woman and the tree of life (17 – 20)	39
C. Progress to Ragnarøk and the dissolution of the world (21 – 53)	40
1. Narrative prelude: three events before Ragnarøk (21 – 33)	40
(i) The divine war of Æsir and Vanir (21 – 24)	41
(ii) The giant builder's attempt to possess the goddess Freyja (25 – 26)	44
(iii) The killing of Baldr and its prelude (26 – 32)	46
(a) The oaths	46
(b) The völva involved: a völuspá within Völuspá	48
(1) Heimdallr as watchman	48
(2) Óðinn's old-world runes—Fimbultýs fornar rúnar	49
(3) The vision of Baldr's fate—ørlog fólgin	51
(iv) Post mortem	54

2. Moral prelude: punishments and portents before Ragnarök (34 – 46)	54
3. Emotional prelude: compassion for the fated gods (47 – 53)	57
D. After Ragnarök: the ending and renewing of the world (54 – 62)	59
III. The Texts of Vqluspá and their Relationship	61
A. MSS. of the poem used in the present edition	61
B. The history of the text	62
1. A general foreword	62
2. Causes of error in the transmission of the text	62
3. An outline of the history of the text	63
C. Analysis of textual Problems (I–VI) relating to the history of the text	65
Problem I: Scribal error in *R II	65
(i) Scribal error in *R II transmitted to R and H	65
(a) 17/1	65
(b) 43/1	65
(c) 59/7	65
(ii) Scribal error in *R II transmitted to R and SnE	66
Problem II: Interpolations	66
(i) Two interpolations common to R, H, and SnE, inherited from *R II	66
(a) 5/5–10: the sun, stars, and moon in uncertainty	66
(b) 10 – 16: the dwarf stanzas	67
(ii) A third interpolation in R	68
Problem III: Divergence from *R II in H and SnE	68
(i) Divergence between R and H, SnE (verse citations)	68
(a) Standardization of tense in 37 – 39 in H, SnE	68
(b) Standardization of stanza sequence in 45 – 50 in H, SnE	69
(c) Deconstruction in H, SnE of the battle sequence 51 – 53	70
(d) Miscellaneous divergences in single words or phrases	74
(ii) Divergence between R and H, SnE (prose)	74
(a) Standardization of dwelling place: from lake to hall (20/3)	74
(b) Standardization of vocabulary (57, 58)	75

(iii) Two substantial substitutions for the R text in H, which can be associated with SnE	76
(a) 34/1–4	76
(b) 52	76
(iv) Divergence between R and H where there is no SnE parallel text (other than instances considered under Problems V and VI)	77
(a) 20/9–12	77
(b) 22/5–6	78
(c) 43/5–6	78
Problem IV: Snorri's variants, not shared by R, H	79
(a) 3/2	79
(b) 5/5–10	79
(c) 9/5, 10/5–7	79
(d) 19/1, 3	79
(e) 26/1	80
(f) 37/1, 38/1, 61/1	80
(g) 38/7	81
(h) 53/11	81
(j) 61/3	81
Problem V: Textual flaws in R that are not in H	81
(i) Scribal slips in R	81
(a) Omissions: 1/2, 57/5–6	81
(b) Other copying errors: 25/5, 26/1, 40/5, 45/9–12, 38/4	81
(ii) Less certain scribal slips in R	82
(a) 26/8	82
(b) 41/6	82
(c) 53/11	82
Problem VI: The further development of the H text: changes not directly attributable to Snorri	83
(i) Rearrangement of the stanza order 21 – 43, causing accidental omission of 28 – 33	83
(a) 20 H, 25 – 27 H	83
(b) 39 – 40 H	84
(c) 21 – 24 H	84
(d) 34 H	84
(e) 43 H, 41 – 42 H	85
(f) 37 – 38 H, 43 – 44 H	85
(ii) Omission of two stanza sequences	85
(a) 28 – 33	85
(b) 35 – 36	86

(iii) Insertion of two additional instances of Refrain III	86
(iv) Two insertions of popular portentous verse in the context of Ragnarök	86
(a) After 44/10	86
(b) After 45/12	87
(v) Insertion of a Christian stanza between 61 and 62	87
(vi) Two inept lines substituted for 7/3-4	87
(vii) Substitution of þussa meyar for 17/2	88
D. MS. R corrections	88
E. MS. variants of the dwarf-names in Völuspá 10 - 16	90
IV. The Christian Context of Völuspá	93
Excursus: some motifs compared in Völuspá and Sibylline Oracles	99
1. The Sibyl herself	99
(i) Her origins	99
(ii) Her status and moral stature	100
2. The moments of time	101
(i) Cyclic time	101
(ii) The present moment and the signs of the end	102
(iii) The last battle and the end of the world	103
(iv) The new earth	103
COMMENTARY ON THE TEXT	105
APPENDIX: BALDRS DRAUMAR	154
Text and Translation	154
Commentary	158

VQLUSPÁ

1 Hlióðs bið ek allar [helgar] kindir meiri ok minni mogo Heimdal[1]ar. Vildo at ek, Valföðr, vel fyr telia forn spiðll fira, þau er fremst um man.	I ask for hearing from all hallowed seed, greater and humbler sons of Heimdallr. You wish me, Sire of the Slain, well to narrate the world's old news, such as I remember from remotest times.
2 Ek man iðtna ár um borna, þá er forðom mik fædda höfðo. Nío man ek heima, nío íviðjur, miðtvið mæran, fyr mold neðan.	I remember giants born early in time, who long ago had reared me. Nine worlds I remember, nine wood-ogresses, glorious tree of good measure, under the ground.
3 Ár var alda, þar er Ymir byggði: vara sandr né sær né svalar unnir. Iðrð fannz æva né upphiminn: gap var ginnunga, en gras hvergi,	It was early in the ages when Ymir made his dwelling: there was not sand nor sea nor chill waves. Earth was not to be found nor above it heaven: a gulf was there of gaping voids and grass nowhere,
4 Áðr Burs synir biððom um ypðo,	Before Burr's sons lifted up seashores,

In H forms of u/v, d/ð can be much alike. 1/2 helgar] so H; om. R 1/4 -dallar] so H; -dalar R 1/5 Vildo] villtv H Valföðr] vafðörs H 1/6 fyr] fram H 1/8 er] er ek H 2/3 þá] See MS. R corrections 1. 2/6 íviðjur] so also H (i uiðjur). See MS. R corrections 2. 3/3 sær] sior H (SnE) 3/7 ginnunga] See MS. R corrections 3. 3/8 hvergi] ekki H (SnE) 4/1 Burs] bors H (SnE prose) 4/2 um] of H

For SnE readings I have used the text and variants of FJ (SnE) and JH and the variants in Bugge (a), 26-33, and only consulted the MSS. in a few cases of particular problematic interest.

3/1-8 SnE 11 3/1 alda] halda SR 3/2 þar] so U; þat SR, T, W Ymir byggði] ecki var SnE 3/3 vara] varat W sær] sior U; siár W 3/4 unnir] vndir U (i.e. 'wounds') 3/5 æva] so W; eði SR, T, U 3/8 hvergi] so U; ecki SR, T, W 4/1 Burs] so U in chapter title; Bors SnE prose 14

- þeir er miðgarð
mæran skópo.
Sól skein sunnan
á salar steina—
þá var grund gróin
grænom lauki.
- 5 Sól varp sunnan, sinni mána,
hendi inni hægri um himiniður.
- Sól þat né vissi,
hvar hón sali átti,
stiðnor þat né visso,
hvar þær staði áttó,
máni þat né vissi,
hvat hann megins átti.
- 6 Þá gengo regin öll
á røkstóla,
ginnheilög goð,
ok um þat gættuz:
nótt ok niðiom
nofn um gáfo:
morgin héto
ok miðian dag, undorn ok aptan,
árom at telia.
- 7 Hittoz æsir á lðavelli, þeir er horg ok hof
hátimbroðo.
Afla lögðo, auð smiðoðo, tangir skópo
ok tól gærðo.
- they who moulded glorious Miðgarðr.
Sun shone from the south
on the stones of that mansion—then the ground was covered with the green leek's growth.
- Sun flung from the south
—moon's partner in travel—her right hand round the rim of the sky.
- Sun did not know where she had mansions, stars did not know where they had stations, moon did not know what might he had.
- Then the powers all strode
to their thrones of fate,
sacrosanct gods,
and gave thought to this:
to night and her offspring allotted names, called them morning
and midday,
afternoon and evening,
to count in years.
- Æsir met
on Eddying Plain,
they who built towering altars and temples.
They founded forges, fashioned wealth, moulded tongs
and made tools.

4/3-4 miðgarð mæran] mæran miðgarð H 4/6 á salar steina] See MS. R corrections 4.
5/1 Sól] marginal capital R 5/4 um himiniður] of iðdur H; -iodyr R 5/5-10 See Problem II (i) (a). 6/1 gengo] gen | gengo R 7/3-4 þeir — hátimbroðo] afls kostuðu allz freistuðu H. See Problem VI (vi). 7/5 Afla] See MS. R corrections 5.

- 8 Teflðo í túni,
teitir vóro—
var þeim vettergis vant ór gulli—unz þriár kvómo
þursa meyar, ámátkar miðk,
ór iqtunheimom.
- 9 Þá gengo regin öll
á røkstóla,
ginnheilög goð,
ok um þat gættuz,
hvárt skyldi dverga dróttir skepia ór Brimis blóði
ok ór Bláinn[s] leggiom.
- 10 Þar [var] Mótsognir mæztr um orðinn dverga allra,
en Durinn annarr.
Þeir manlíkon
morg um gærðo, dvergar, ór iqrðo,
sem Durinn sagði:
- 11 'Nýi ok Niði,
Norðri ok Suðri,
- They played chequers in the meadow, they were merry—
for them there was no want of gold—until there came three ogres' daughters, of redoubtable strength,
from Giant Realms.
- Then the powers all strode
to their thrones of fate,
sacrosanct gods,
and gave thought to this:
whether they should create companies of dwarfs from Brimir's blood and from Bláinn's limbs.
- There did Mootsucker become most esteemed of all dwarfs,
and Doorward next.
They fashioned many figurines,
these dwarfs, out of earth,
as Doorward told:
- 'New Moon and No Moon,
North and South,

8/3 vettergis] uettugis H 8/5 þriár] so in full H; iii. R 8/6 þursa] þussa H
9/1-4 Þá — gættuz] so H; abbreviated Þá g. r. a. ar. R On the dwarf stanzas, 9-16, see Problem II (i) (b). 9/5 hvárt] so Ff (b) ad loc.; hvær R; hvær H. See Problem II (i) (b). skyldi] skylldu H dverga] dvergar H 9/6 dróttir] so H (drottir); drotin (i.e. dróttin) R 9/7 Brimis blóði] brimi blóðgv H (SnE) 9/8 Bláins] so, or possibly blams, H (SnE); blám R (cf. lægiarn[s] líki 34/3) 10-16 For dwarf name variants see Vsp Introd III. E. 10/1 var] so H (u*); om. R
10/2,6 um] of H (SnE) 10/5 manlíkon] manlikan H 10/7 dvergar] dverga H ór] i
H (SnE) 11/1,2,3 ok] not in H (SnE)

9/1-8 SnE 20 9/1-4 abbreviated in U, although the lines have not previously been cited
9/4 um] so T, U, W; of SR 9/5 hvárt] hvær U, W; at SR, T 9/6 dróttir] drott of SR,
T, W; drot v U skepia] spekia U 9/7 Brimis blóði] so T; brimi blóðgo SR, U, W
9/8 ór] om. U Bláins leggiom] so W (blaens); blams leggiu T, U; blam slegið SR 10/5-8 SnE 21 10/5-6 Þeir mannlikon . . . gærðo] so U; þar manlikv . . . gerpvz SR, T, W 10/6 um] so U; of SR, T, W 10/7 ór] i SR, T, U, W 10/8 sem — sagði] sem þeim dyrinn kendi U 11-16 SnE 21, as for R, H above 11/1,2,3 ok] so W; not in SR, T, U

- Austri ok Vestri, Alþjófr, Dvalinn,
Bivorr, Bávorr, Bomburr, Nóri, Án ok Ánarr, Ái, Miðvitnir,
- 12 Veigr ok Gandálfr, Vindálfr, Þráinn, Þekkr ok Þorinn,
Þróv, Vitr ok Littr,
Nár ok Nýráðr—
nú hefi ek dverga
—Reginn ok Ráðsviðr—rétt um talða.
- 13 Fíli, Kíli, Fundinn, Náli,
Hepti, Víli, Hannarr, Svíorr,
Frár, Hornbori,
Frægr ok Lóni, Aurvangr, Iari, Eikinskialdi.
- 14 Mál er dverga
í Dvalins liði líóna kindom
til Lofars telia, þeir er sóttu
frá Salarsteini Aurvanga siqt til Iðrovalla.
- 15 Þar var Draupnir
ok Dólgrasir,
- East and West,
All-thief, Dawdler, Trembler, Trumbler,
Tubby, Shipper, Friend and Fighter, Old Father, Mead Wolf,
- Potion and Sprite Elf,
Wind Elf, Yearner,
Docile and Darer, Thrive, Clever and Colour, Corpse and New Counsellor—now I have the dwarfs —Power and Plan-wise—correctly counted.
- Trunky, Creeky, Found, Needly, Handle, Drudge,
Craftsman, Dwindler, Brilliant, Horn Borer, Famous and Lagooner, Loam Lea, Earthy,
Oakenshield.
- It is time to trace the dwarfs in Dawdler's troop, for men's progeny, back to Praiser—
those dwarfs who sought, from Mansion's Stone, the homes of Loam Leas
at Earth Plains.
- There was Dropper
And Strife Eager,

11/5 Bivorr] initial capital H 12/1 ok] not in H (SnE); written 7|7, the first deleted R
12/1,4 See MS. R corrections 6 and 7. 12/6 dverga] rekka H (cf. SnE variant 12/7)
13/7 Aurvangr] initial capital H 14/1 Mál] no initial capital H 14/5 þeir] þeim H
14/6 frá Salarsteini] See MS. R corrections 8. 14/7 Aur-] ar- R; qv- H

12/1 ok] not in SnE 12/6,8 not in SnE 12/7 Reginn ok] Reckr SnE 14/5-8 SnE prose 21 14/6 Salarsteini] Svarins (Svarnis U) havgi SnE 14/7 Aur-] so SR, T, U; or- W

- Hár, Haugspori,
Hlévangr, Glói, Skirvir, Virvir, Skáfiðr, Ái,
- 16 Álfr ok Yngvi, Eikinskialdi,
Fialarr ok Frosti, Finnr ok Ginnarr.
Þat mun uppi,
meðan öld lifir,
langniðia tal Lofars hafat.
- 17 Unz þrír kvómo
ór því liði öflgir ok ástgir
æsir at húsi.
Fundo á landi
lítt megandi
Ask ok Emblo örloðglausa.
- 18 Qnd þau né áttu, óð þau né höfðu,
lá né læti
né lito góða.
Qnd gaf Óðinn,
óð gaf Hœnir, lá gaf Lóðurr
ok lito góða.
- 19 Ask veit ek standa, heitir Yggdrasill,
- High, Grave Treader, Shelter Field, Gleamer, Joiner, Groiner,
Crooked Finn, Old Father,
- Elf and Yngvi,
Oakenshield,
Hider and Frosty,
Finn and Potent.
Uplifted in memory
as long as the world lives will be this list of Praiser's lineage.
- Until three came out of that company, mighty and loving Æsir to a house.
They found on land,
little capable,
Ash and Emblo,
without destiny.
- Breath they had not, spirit they had not,
no film of flesh nor cry of voice,
nor comely hues.
Breath Óðinn gave, spirit Hœnir gave,
film of flesh Lóðurr gave and comely hues.
- An Ash I know there stands,
Yggdrasill is its name,

16/1 Álfr] no initial capital R 16/5 Þat] initial capital H mun] man æ H
16-17 There is no indication in the MSS. of a lacuna between these stanzas. 17/1 þrír] þriár R; þriar
(a erased) H 17/2 ór því liði] þussa meyar (erased, but no text substituted) H 17/3 öflgir ok ástgir] æstkr ok öflgr H 18/1 Qnd] no initial capital R, H 18/5 Qnd] initial capital
R, H

19/1-8 SnE 25 19/1 standa] so U; avsinn SR, T, W 19/2 Yggdrasill] so T, U, W; Yggdrasils SR

- hár baðmr, ausinn
hvítaauri.
Þaðan koma döggrvar
þærs í dala falla.
Stendr æ yfir grœnn Urðar brunni.
- 20 Þaðan koma meylar
margs vitandi, þriár, ór þeim sæ,
er und þolli stendr.
Urð héto eina,
aðra Verðandi
—skáro á skiði—
Skuld ena þriðio.
Þær lög lögðo,
þær líf kuro
alda börnom, örlog seggia.
- 21 Þat man hón fólkvíg
fyrst í heimi,
er Gullveigo geirom studdu ok í holl Hárs hána brendo—þrýsvar brendo þrýsvar borna, opt, ósialdan—
þó hón enn lifir.
- 22 Heiði hana héto
hvars til húsa kom, völu vel spá
- a tall tree, showered with shining loam.
From there come the dews
that drop in the valleys.
It stands forever green over Urðr's well.
- From there come maidens deep in knowledge, three, from the lake
that lies under the tree.
Urðr they called one, 'Had to be',
the second Verðandi, 'Coming to be'
—they incised the slip of wood—Skuld the third, 'Has to be'.
They laid down laws, they chose out lives
for mankind's children, men's destinies.
- She remembers the war,
the first in the world,
when Gold Brew
they studded with spears and burned her in Hárr's hall, three times burned her three times reborn —often, not stinting—
yet she still lives.
- Bright Heiðr they called her at all the houses she came to, a good seer of fair fortunes

19/3 baðmr] See MS. R corrections 9. 20/1 Þaðan] marginal capital R. See MS. R corrections 10. 20/3 sæ] sal H (SnE). See Problem III (ii) (a). 20/4 und] a H 20/9 Þær] initial capital R, H 20/12 seggia] at segia H. See Problem III (iv) (a). 21 Here the order of stanzas in H diverges from that in R. See Problem VI (i). 21/3 Gullveigo] gullueig H. See MS. R corrections 11. 21/4 studdu] studdi H 21/7 þrýsvar] initial capital R; þrýsvar brendo written twice H 22/3 völu] ok völu H

19/3 baðmr] borinn U ausinn] heilagr SnE 19/6 þærs] so W; þær U; er SR, T dala] so T; dali SR, U, W 19/7 Stendr] so U, W; stendr hann SR, T æ] om. U yfir] fyrir T 20 SnE prose 23 20/3 ór þeim sæ] ór þeim sal SnE

- vitti hón ganda.
Seið hón kunni,
seið hón leikin.
Æ var hón angan
illrar brúðar.
- 23 Þá gengo regin öll
á rökstóla,
ginnheilög goð,
ok um þat gættuz:
hvárt skyldo æsir afráð gjalda eða skyldo goðin öll gildi eiga.
- 24 Fleggöi Óðinn
ok í fólk um skaut—þat var enn fólkvíg
fyrst í heimi.
Brotinn var borðveg[g]r
borgar ása.
Knátto vanir vígspá
völlo sporna.
- 25 Þá gengo regin öll
á rökstóla,
ginnheilög goð,
ok um þat gættuz,
hverr hefði lopt alt lævi blandit
eða ætt iðtuns
Óðs mey gefna.
- 26 Þórr einn þar vá,
þrunginn móði
- she conjured spirits who told her.
Sorcery she had skill in,
sorcery she practised, possessed.
She was ever the darling of an evil wife.
- Then the powers all strode
to their thrones of fate,
sacrosanct gods,
and gave thought to this:
whether the Æsir should pay such a price and all the gods get recognition?
- Óðinn flung and shot into the host—it was war still,
the first in the world.
Torn was the timber wall of the Æsir's stronghold.
Vanir were—by a war charm—live and kicking on the plain.
- Then all the powers strode
to their thrones of fate,
sacrosanct gods,
and gave thought to this:
who had laced all the air with ruin and to the giant's kin wedded Óðr's girl?
- Þórr alone smote there,
swollen with wrath

22/4 vitti] ulti H 22/5 seið hón kunni] seið hon hvars (h corrected from k) hvn kunni H 22/6 leikin] leikin R; hvgleikin H. The R reading (with n for n; see JH I § 6.11) must be correct: see commentary ad loc. and Problem III (iv) (b). 22/8 brúðar] See MS. R corrections 12. 23/1 Þá] marginal capital R 23/1-4 Þá — gættuz] so H; abbreviated Pa g. r. a. a. R 24/4 fyrst] fyr H 24/5 -vegg] so H; -vegr R 25/1-4 Þá — gættuz] so H; abbreviated Pa g. r. a. R 25/5 hverr] so H (SnE); hværir R 26/1 vá] so H (SnE); v^{er} R

25/1-8 SnE 47 25/1-4 Þá — gættuz] so SR, T, W; partly abbreviated U 25/4 um] so U, W; of SR, T 25/5 hverr] so SnE 26/1-8 SnE 47 26/1-4 follow 5-8 in SR, T, U; 5-8 are not in W 26/1 þar] þat SR, W vá] so T, U, W; van SR

—hann sialdan sitr,
er hann slíkt um fregn!
Á gengoz eiðar—
orð ok særi,
mál þll meginlig,
er á meðal vóro.

—he seldom sits idle
when he hears such a thing!
Oaths paid for oaths,
the vows and sworn pledges,
all the words of weight that intervened.

27 Veit hón Heimdal[1]ar hlióð um fólgt undir heiðvǫnom helgom baðmi.
Á sér hón ausaz aurgom forsi
af veði Valfðors.

She knows Heimdallr's hearing is couched beneath the bright-nurtured holy tree.
A stream she sees springing with loamy flood from Sire of the Slain's forfeit.

Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat?

Do you still seek to know? And what?

28 Ein sat hón úti,

þá er inn aldni kom, Yggiungr ása,
ok í augo leit:
'Hvers fregnið mik?
Hví freistið mín?
Alt veit ek, Óðinn, hvar þú auga falt:
í enom mæra
Mímis brunni!
Drekkr miðð Mímir morgin hverian
af veði Valfðors!'

Alone she held séance out in the night, when the old fellow came, Æsir's Son of Dread,
and looked into her eyes.
'What do you ask me?
Why do you try me?
I know it all, Óðinn,
where you lodged your eye:
in the famed fountain of Mímir!
Mímir drinks mead every morning
from Sire of the Slain's forfeit!'

Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat?

Do you still seek to know? And what?

26/4 um] of H (SnE) 26/8 vóro] so H (voru) (SnE); fóro R. See Problem V (ii) (a).
27/1 Veit] marginal capital R 27/1 -dallar] so H; -dalar R 27/6 aurgom] ærgö R; ørgū
H 27/8 Vitoð ér] uitu þ^{er} H 28-33 not in H. See Problem VI (ii) (a).
28/3 Yggiungr] ygióngR 28/8 See M.S. R corrections 13. 28/13 Valfðors] abbreviated
v. R (cf. 27/7) 28/14 Vitoð — hvat] abbreviated v. e. e. h. R

26/4 um] of SnE 26/8 vóro] so T (voru); forv SR, U 28/7-14 SnE 22
28/8 þú] so T, U, W; á SR 28/9 í enom] i hinū W; j þ^m enō T, U; vr þ^{im} enū SR mæra] meira T 28/11 miðð] moð SR 28/13 veði] so T, U, W; corrected from veiþi SR 28/13-14 Valfðors — hvat] unabbreviated SnE 28/14 Vitoð ér] so T; vitvð þer SR; viti þer
U; vitu þer W

29 Valði henne Herfðor
hringa ok men.
Fé[kk] spiðll spaklig ok spáganda:
sá hón vitt ok um vitt—
of verðld hveria.

War Sire chose for her rings and necklaces.
He got wise news
and spirits of prophecy.
She saw far, and far beyond—over every world.

30 Sá hón valkyrior
vitt um komnar, gǫrvar at ríða
til goðþiódar.
Skuld helt skildi,
en Skǫgul ǫnnor,
Gunnr, Hildr, Gǫndul
ok Geirskǫgul.

She saw valkyries come from afar, ready to ride
to the realm of the gods.
Skuld bore a shield,
and Skǫgul was with her,
Gunnr, Hildr, Gǫndul
and Spear-Skǫgul.

Nú ero talðar nǫnnor Herians,
gǫrvar at ríða
grund, valkyrior.

Now are listed
the ladies of War Lord,
ready to ride,
valkyries, over the earth.

31 Ek sá Baldri, blóðgom tívor, Óðins barni,
ørlog fólgin.
Stóð um vaxinn,
völlo[m] hæri,
miór ok miðk fagr,
mistilteinn.

I saw for Baldr—
for the bloodstained sacrifice, Óðinn's child—
the fates set hidden.
There stood full-grown,
higher than the plains,
slender and most fair,
the mistletoe.

32 Varð af þeim meiði, er mæz sýndiz,
harmflaug hættlig:
Hǫðr nam skióta.
Baldrs bróðir var
of borinn snemma:
sá nam, Óðins sonr, einnætr vega.

There formed from that stem, which was slender-seeming,
a shaft of anguish, perilous:
Hǫðr started shooting.
A brother of Baldr was born quickly:
he started—Óðinn's son—slaying, at one night old.

29/1 Valði] marginal capital R 29/3 Fékk] fe R. See commentary. 30/9-12 See Problem II (ii). 31/6 vóllo[m] vollo R 32/1 Varð] marginal capital R 32/2 mæz]
m^{er}, i.e. mér or mæz, R. JH 1. 8 compares (Hǫgna) mæz HH II 17, which has the same abbreviation.
sýndiz] See M.S. R corrections 14.

- 33 Þó hann æva hendr
né hofuð kembði, áðr á bál um bar Baldrs andskota—en Frigg um grét í Fensqlom vá Valhallar.
- He never washed hands,
never combed head,
till he bore to the pyre Baldr's adversary—
while Frigg wept in Fen Halls
for Valholl's woe.

Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat? Do you still seek to know? And what?

- 34 Hapt sá hón liggja
undir Hveralundi, lægjarn[s] líki
Loka áþekkian.
Þar sitr Sigyn, þeygi um sinom
ver velglýioð.
- A captive she saw lying under Cauldrons' Grove, in the shape of malignant Loki, unmistakable.
There Sigyn sits, surely with little delight in her husband.

Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat? Do you still seek to know? And what?

- 35 Á fellr austan
um eitrdala,
spxom ok sverðom:
Slíðr heitir sú.
- A river falls from the east through venom-cold dales, with knives and swords:
Savage is its name.

- 36 Stóð fyr norðan, á Niðavqlom,
salr ór gulli Sindra ættar;
en annarr stóð á Ókólni, biórsalr iqtuns,
en sá Brimir heitir.
- There stood to the north on Dark of the Moon Plains the hall made of gold of Sindri's race.
Yet another stood on Never Cold,
the beer hall of a giant,
and he is named Brimir.

33/7 vá] See MS. R corrections 15. 33/8 Vitoð — hvat] abbreviated v. e. e. e. h. R 34/1-4 Hapt — áþekkian] here H reads: Þa kna vala vigbond snua helldr v^{om} harðgior hopt or þormu. See Problem III (iii) (a). 34/3 lægjarns] See commentary. 34/7 velglýioð] uel | glyiut H 34/8 Vitoð — hvat] abbreviated v. þ. e. h. R; vitu þer en eða huat H After 34 and before 41 H cites a full version of Refrain III, see Problem VI (ii). On variant lines 5-6 see textual variants to 43 R and Problem III (iv) (c). It is notable that in the first instances of Refrain III, in H and in R (43/1), nú is omitted; see Problem I (i) (b). 35, 36 not in H; see Problem VI (ii) (b). 36/1 Stóð] no initial capital R 36/2 -vqlom] corrected from -fiollö R (cf. SnE prose). See MS. R corrections 16.

- 37 Sal sá hón standa sólo fiarri, Náströndo á,
norðr horfa dyrr.
Fello eitrdropar inn um lióra.
Sá er undinn salr
orma hryggiom.
- A hall she saw standing remote from the sun on Dead Body Shore.
Its door looks north.
There fell drops of venom
in through the roof vent.
That hall is woven of serpents' spines.

- 38 Sá hón þar vaða
þunga strauma menn meinsvara ok morðvarga ok þannz annars glepr eyrarúno.
Þar saug Niðhoggr
nái framgengna, sleit vargr vera.
- She saw there wading onerous streams men perjured and wolfish murderers and the one who seduces another's close-trusted wife.
There Malice Striker sucked corpses of the dead,
the wolf tore men.

Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat? Do you still seek to know? And what?

- 39 Austr sat in aldna
í Iárnviði, ok foeddi þar
Fenris kindir.
Verðr af þeim qlom
einna nøkkorr tungls tiúgari
í trollz hami.
- In the east she sat, the old one,
in Iron Wood, and bred there
the broods of Fenrir.
There will come from them all one of that number to be a moon-snatcher in troll's skin.

37/1 sá] sier H. On the divergence of tense in 37, 38, 39 see Problem III (i) (a). 37/5 fello] falla
H (SnE) 38/1 Sá] Ser H 38/3-4 meinsvara ok morðvarga] See MS. R corrections 17.
38/4 morðvarga] so H; morðvargar R (SnE) 38/5 þannz] See MS. R corrections 18.
38/6 eyrarúno] eyrna runa H 38/7 saug] so H; svgr R 38/10 Vitoð — hvat] abbreviated v. e. e. e. h. R; vitu þer etc. H After 38 and before 44 H cites Refrain III, lines 1-4 abbreviated:
Geyr nu garmr miok f^{rr} gn. h. f. man sl. en f. 39/1 sat] byr H (SnE) in] hin H (SnE)
39/3 foeddi] feðr H (SnE) 39/8 trollz] tröllz H (SnE)

37/1-8 SnE 75 37/1 sá hón] veit ec SnE 37/3 -ströndu] so SR, W (-ströndu);
-stravndú T, U (and SnE prose) 37/5 fello] falla SnE 37/6 um] so U, W; of SR, T 38/1-4, 7-8 SnE 75 38/1 Sá hón] Skvlv SnE morðvarga] morðv^{ar}gar SR, T, W; morðingiar U 38/7 saug] q^{er}lr SnE 39/1-8 SnE 19 39/1 sat] býr SnE in] hin W aldna] arma U 39/2 -viði] -uidiom T; viðiu W 39/3 foeddi] fæþ^r SnE 39/5 af] so U, W; ór SR, T 39/6 nøkkorr] hu^{er}ra T 39/7 tungls tiúgari] tungl tuigan
T; tungls t^{er}gari U 39/8 trollz] so U; tröllz SR, T, W

- 40 Fylliz fiörvi feigra manna, rýðr ragna siot
rauðom dreyra.
Svört verða sólskin of sumor eptir,
veðr öll válynd.
- Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat?
- 41 Sat þar á haugi ok sló hǫrpo gýgiar hirðir, glaðr Eggþér.
Gól um hánom í Galgviði fagrrauðr hani, sá er Fialarr heitir.
- 42 Gól um ásom Gullinkambi—sá vekr hǫlða at Heriafðors—en annarr gelr
fyr iðrð neðan, sóttrauðr hani,
at sǫlom Heljar.
- 43 Geyr [nú] Garmr miðk fyr Gnipahelli—
festr mun slitna,
en freki renna.
Fiðlð veit hón fræða—
- It sates itself on the life-blood of fated men, paints red the powers' homes with crimson gore.
Black become the sun's beams in the summers that follow, weathers all treacherous.
- Do you still seek to know? And what?
- There sat on the grave-mound and struck his harp
the ogress's herdsman, happy Eggþér.
Above him crew
in Gallows Wood the gleaming red cock that is named Fialarr.
- Over the Æsir crew
Comb of Gold
—he wakes the warriors at War Sire's dwelling—while another crows beneath the earth, a rust-red cock
at the halls of Hel.
- Now Garmr bays loud
before Looming Cave—
the fetter will break
and the ravener run free.
Much she knows of old knowledge,

40/1 Fylliz] no capital initial H 40/5 Svört verða] so H (SnE); svart v^{er} þa R 40/6 of] um H (SnE) 40/8 Vitoð — hvat] abbreviated v. e. h. R; uitu þ^{er} ein en þ^{er} hvat H (SnE)
41/4 Eggþér] egð^{ir} H 41/5 um hánom] yf^{ir} H 41/6 Gálg-] so H; gagl- R 41/8 sá er] en sa H (cf. 36/8) 42/1 um] yf^{ir} H 42/4 at Heriafðors] at hiarar at h^{er}iafðors R (no correction marks) 43/1 nú] om. R, H. See Problem I (i) (b). miðk] See MS. R corrections 19. 43/2 Gnipa-] gnupa- H (cf. gnipa- three times subsequently) 43/3 festr]
See MS. R corrections 20. mun] man H 43/5 Fiðlð — fræða] fram se ek lengr H

40/1-8 SnE 19 40/5 Svört verða] so SnE 40/6 of] so SR; um T, U, W
40/7 veðr] so W; v^{er}þr SR, T, U válynd] so T; va. ly. U; valvnd SR, W 40/8 Vitoð — hvat] so SR, T; uitu þ^{er} etc. W; v. einn (i erased) ok h. U

- fram sé ek lengra,
um ragna rǫk
rǫmm, sigtíva.
- 44 Bræðr muno beriaz
ok at þonom verða[z], muno systrungar
sifiom spilla.
Hart er í heimi, hórdómr mikill
—skeggöld, skálmöld
—skildir ro klofnir—vindöld, vargöld—
áðr veröld steypiz.
Mun engi maðr þóðrom þyrma.
- 45 Leika Míms synir, en miðtuðr kyndiz
at en[o] galla Giallarhorni.
Hátt blæss Heimdallr
—horn er á lopti—mælr Óðinn
við Míms hǫfuð.
†Skelfr Yggdrasil askr standandi,† ymr it aldna tré
en iðtunn losnar.
- ahead I see further,
over the fate of the powers,
virulent fate of victory's gods.
- Brothers will fight and kill each other, sisters' children will defile kinship.
It is harsh in the world, whoredom rife
—an axe age, a sword age —shields are riven—
a wind age, a wolf age—before the world goes headlong.
No man will have mercy on another.
- Mímr's sons sport,
but fate's measure is lit
at the sound of the clear-ringing Clarion Horn.
Loud blows Heimdallr
—the horn points to the sky—Óðinn talks with Mímr's head.
†Yggdrasil shivers, the ash, as it stands.†
The old tree groans, and the giant slips free.

43/6 fram — lengra] fiðlð kañ ek segia H. See Problem III (iv) (c). 43/8 -tíva] -tyva R 44/2 verðaz] so H; verða R (SnE) 44/7 skeggöld] miswritten skeggöll H 44/8 ro] not in H (SnE) 44/9 vindöld] initial capital H 44/10 steypiz] here H adds grund^{ir} gialla gifr fliugandi. See Problem VI (iv) (a). 44/11 mun] man H 45/1 Leika] marginal capital R 45/3 eno galla] en galla R; hinu gamla H 45/9-12 Skelfr — losnar] so H (Skelfr with initial capital). In R 9-10 follow 11-12. See MS. R corrections 21. 45/12 losnar] here H adds hræðaz allir á helvegð aðr surtar þañ sevi of gleyp^{ir}. See Problem VI (iv) (b). In H 49 follows here; see under 49 R below.

44/1-12 SnE 70 44/2 verðaz] so SR, W; v^{er}ða T, U 44/5 í heimi] so U; með hæðv SR, T (haldö), W 44/7 skeggöld] so U; skegiöld SR, W; skegiald ok T
44/8 ro] not in SnE klofnir] so SR, T, W; klofna U 44/10 áðr] so SR, T, W; undz U
44/11-12 mun — þyrma] mvin enn maðr oþrvn þyrma U; not in SR, T, W (but cf. prose introducing 44) 45/5-12 SnE 73 45/6 lopti] so T, U, W; lopt SR 45/7 mælr] so U, W; abbreviated mey SR, me (miswritten nie) T 45/8 Míms] mimis T, U 45/11 aldna] so T, W; alna SR, U 45/12 en — losnar] æsir e^v a þingi U (from 49/4) After 45/12 a sequence of eight stanzas follows (in the order 49, 47-48, 50-54 R) without prose interruption. U has only 49 and 54.

- 46 Geyr nú Garmr miok
fyr Gniphelli—
festr mun slitna,
en freki renna.
Fiðlð veit hón fræða—
fram sé ek lengra,
um ragna røk
rømm, sigtíva.
- 47 Hrymr ekr austan,
hefiz lind fyrir.
Snýz Iormungandr
í iotunmóði.
Ormr knýr unnir, en ari hlakkar—
slitr náí neffölr.
Naglfar losnar.
- 48 Kiöll ferr austan:
koma muno Muspellz
um lög lýðir,
en Loki stýrir.
Fara fífls megir
með freka allir—
þeim er bróðir Býleipz í fyr.
- 49 Hvat er með ásom?
Hvat er með álfom?
Gnýr allr iotunheimr.
Æsir ro á þingi.
Stynia dvergar
- Now Garmr bays loud
before Looming Cave—
the fetter will break
and the ravener run free.
Much she knows of old knowledge,
ahead I see further,
over the fate of the powers,
virulent fate of victory's gods.
- Hrymr drives from the east,
hoists his shield before him.
Mighty Wraith coils
in giant wrath.
The snake flails the waves, and the eagle exults—
pale-beaked rips corpses.
Nail Boat slips free.
- A ship moves from the east:
there shall come Muspell's levies by water,
and Loki is pilot.
The giant's sons are journeying all with the ravener—Býleiptr's brother keeps them company.
- What troubles the Æsir?
What troubles the Elves?
Giant Realm is all aroar.
The Æsir are in council.
Dwarfs groan

46 cf. 43 46/1 Geyr — miok] abbreviated Geyr nv g. R. No more of the stanza is given.
47/7 neffölr] niðfölr H (SnE) 48/5 Fara] farar H fífls megir] fíflmegr H 48/6 allir] ap'et H (probably first written ap'; see Hkb 191, n. 6) 48/8 Býleipz] byleiszt H (SnE) fyr] f'ed H 49 in H (SnE) follows 45 R. See Problem III (i) (b). 49/4 ro] eru H

47 SnE 73 (not U) 47/6 en — hlakkar] so W; arn mñ hlacka SR, T 47/7 neffölr] niðfölr SR, T, W 48 SnE 73 (not U) 48/3 um] so T, W; of SR 48/5 Fara] so W; þar ró SR, T fífls] fífl- SR, W; fífls- T 48/8 Býleipz] byleiszt W; byleiz SR, T (cf. SnE prose 34: byleistr SR, T (bly-), W; byleiptr U) 49/1-8 SnE 73 49/2 Hvat — álfom] hvat með asyniv U 49/3-4 Gnýr — þingi] not in U Gnýr] so W; ymr SR, T 49/4 ro] so SR, T; ero W

- fyr steindurom,
veggbergs visir.
- Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat?
- 50 Surtr ferr sunnan
með sviga lævi:
skínn af sverði
sól valtíva.
Griðtbiörg gnata,
en gífr rata.
Troða halir helveg,
en himinn klofnar.
- 51 Þá kómr Hlínar
harmr annarr fram, er Óðinn ferr
við úlf vega, en bani Belia
bjartr at Surti.
Þá mun Friggjar
falla angan.
- 52 Þá kómr inn mikli
mógr Sigfður, Viðarr, vega
at valdýri.
Lætr hann megí Hveðrungs
mund um standa
- at the granite doors,
well knowing their immuring rock.
- Do you still seek to know? And what?
- Surtr moves from the south with the scathe of branches:
there shines from his sword
the sun of Gods of the Slain.
Stone peaks clash,
and troll wives take to the road.
Warriors tread the path from Hel, and heaven breaks apart.
- Then is fulfilled Hlín's second sorrow, when Óðinn goes to fight with the wolf, and Beli's slayer,
bright, against Surtr.
Then shall Frigg's sweet friend fall.
- Then comes the tall
child of Triumph's Sire, Viðarr, to strike
at the beast of slaughter.
Into Hveðrungr's son with his hand he sets the sword

49/6 -durom] -dyrv H 49/7 veggbergs] veggbergs H (SnE), cf. borðvegr, -veggr 24/5
49/8 Vitoð — hvat] abbreviated v. e. e. h. R; uiv þ'et etc. H After 49 and before 47 H cites Refrain
III, lines 1-3 abbreviated: Geyr nu garmr miok f'et gnipa helli f. m. 50/2 lævi] lefi R; levi H (see Hkb 191, n. 9) 50/6 rata] hrata H (SnE) 51-3 See Problem III (i) (c).
51/1 Þá] marginal capital R 51/3 er] en H 51/7 Þá] þar H (SnE) mun] man H
51/8 angan] so H; angan] tyr R; a scribe has absent-mindedly read a rare word as part of a familiar heroic name. After 51 and before 52 H H cites Refrain III, lines 1-3 abbreviated as after 49/8. 52 is replaced in H by a variant stanza (52 H). See Problem III (iii) (b).

49/6 steindurom] so SR, T; steindyrv W; steins dyrv U 49/7 veggbergs visir] not in U vegg-] so SR; veg- T, W 49/8 Vitoð — hvat] so SR; vitu þ'et etc. W; viti þer etc. U
50/1-8 SnE 12 (1) and (not in U) 73 (2) 50/1 Surtr] Svartr U 50/2 lævi] so W; levi
U; leifi SR (1), T; leivi SR (2) 50/6 gífr] guþ'et U rata] so SR, T (1), W (1); hrata T (2), U
(1), W (2) 50/7 Troða — helveg] traða — helvega U 51/1-8 SnE (not in U) 73
51/2 harmr] so T; hamr SR, W 51/7 Þá] þar SnE 51/8 angan] so SR, W; añañ T
52/1-8 SnE (not in U) 74 52/1-3 Þá — vega] gengr opins son við ulf vega víþarr of veg
SR, T (sonr), W 52/6 um] of SnE

- hiqr til hiarta—
þá er hefnt fǫður!
- 53 Þá kómr inn mæri
mógr Hlǫðyniar, gengr Óðins sonr
við orm vega.
Drepr hann af móði
miðgarz véor[r]
—muno halir allir heimstǫð ryðia—
gengr fet nío Fiorgyniar burr neppr frá naðri
níðs ókvíðnom.
- 54 Sól tér sortna,
sigr fold í mar,
hverfa af himni
heiðar stiqrnor.
Geisar eimi við aldrnara, leikr hár hiti
við himin síalfan.
- 55 Geyr nú Garmr miqr
fyr Gniphelli—
festr mun slitna,
en freki renna.
Fiqlǫ veit hón fræða—
fram sé ek lengra,
- to halt in the heart—
then his sire is avenged!
- Then comes the glorious child of Hlǫðyn, Óðinn's son strides
to fight the serpent.
He smites in fury,
shrine-guarder of Miðgarðr
—all heroes will abandon the homestead of earth—
he steps nine paces, Fiorgyn's child,
failing—leaving slain the snake that had not feared its vile act.
- The sun starts to blacken, land sinks into sea,
the radiant stars
recoil from the sky.
Fume rages against fire,
fosterer of life,
the heat soars high against heaven itself.
- Now Garmr bays loud
before Looming Cave—
the fetter will break
and the ravener run free.
Much she knows of old knowledge,
ahead I see further,

53/3 gengr] See MS. R corrections 22. 53/4 orm] ulf R (cf. 52/1–2 SnE) 53/6 véorr] uþor R 53/8 ryðia] See MS. R corrections 23. 53/12 níðs] See MS. R corrections 24.
54/1 Sól] torn away H 54/6 við aldrnara] ok aldrnari H (SnE) 55/1 Geyr] no initial capital R 55/1–8 Geyr — sigtíva] abbreviated Geyr n. R; Geyr [nu torn away] garmr miok f^{yr} gnipa helli festr man slitna en freki r. H

53/1–2, 11–12, 7–8, 5–6 SnE (not in U) 74 53/1 Þá kómr] gengr SnE mæri] meiri T
53/5 Drepr — móði] er af mopi drepr SnE (following 7–8) 53/6 véorr] so SnE 53/7 halir] hallir SR 53/8 heimstǫð] heimsteið SR 53/9 gengr fet nío] not in SnE 74, but cf. SnE prose 72: Þorr . . . stigr þaðan bræt ix. fet 53/11 neppr frá] nepr at SR; neppr T; neppr af W 53/12 ókvíðnom] so SR, W; okuidið T 54/1–8 SnE 74 54/1 tér]
mú SnE 54/2 sigr] so U; sæckr SR, T, W 54/4 heiðar] heiðu (sc. himni) W 54/6 við aldrnara] ok aldrnari SnE

- um ragna rǫk
rǫmm, sigtíva.
- 56 Sér hón upp koma
ǫðro sinni iqrð ór ægi
iðia græna.
Fallar forsar,
flýgr ǫrn yfir,
sá er á fialli
fiska veiðir.
- 57 Finnaz æsir á Iðavelli ok um moldþinur mátkan dæma [ok minnaz þar á megindóma] ok á Fimbultýs fornar rúnar.
- 58 Þar muno eptir
undrsamligar gullnar tǫflor
í grasi finnaz, þærs í árdaga
áttar hǫfðo.
- 59 Muno ósánir
akrar vaxa—
bǫls mun allz batna, Baldr mun koma.
Búa þeir Hǫðr ok Baldr Hroptz sigtǫptir, vés valtívar.
- over the fate of the powers,
virulent fate of victory's gods.
- She sees come up
a second time earth out of ocean
once again green.
The waterfalls flow, an eagle flies over,
in the hills
hunting fish.
- Æsir meet
on Eddying Plain and discourse on the mighty enmesher of earth, and call to mind there the momentous judgements and the Gigantine God's ancient runes.
- There will once more the miraculous golden chequers
be found, in the grass, those that in the old days they had owned.
- Without sowing cornfields will grow—
all harm will be healed,
Baldr will come.
They inhabit, Hǫðr and Baldr, Hroptz's walls of triumph, gods of the sanctuary.

Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat?

Do you still seek to know? And what?

56/1 Sér] marginal capital R; Se torn away H 57/1 Finnaz] Hittaz H 57/5–6 ok minnaz — megindóma] so H; not in R 58/1 Þar muno eptir] Þa muno æser H 58/4 fin-naz] fiña H 59/1 Muno] marginal capital R 59/3 mun] man H 59/4 Baldr mun] man balldr H 59/7 vés valtívar] vel valtívar R, H (ual- corrected from ?uell-; see Hkb 191, n. 19; JH 14 ad loc.). See Problem I (i) (c). 59/8 Vitoð — hvat] abbreviated v. e. e. h. R; uitu þ^{er} etc. H

- 60 Þá kná Hænir
hlautvið kíosa, ok þurir byggja bræðra tveggja
vindheim víðan.
Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat?
Then Hænir picks out
the twig of augury, and sons of the two brothers set up their home
in the wide wind realm.
Do you still seek to know? And what?
- 61 Sal sér hón standa sólo fegra, gulli þakðan,
á Gimlé.
Þar skolo dyggvar dróttir byggja ok um aldrdaga
ynðis nióta.
A hall she sees standing, brighter than the sun,
roofed with gold,
on Refuge from the Flames.
There shall the worthy warrior bands dwell and all their days of life enjoy delight.
- 62 Þar kœmr inn dimmi
dreki flúgandi, naðr fránn, neðan
frá Niðafiðllo.
Berr sér í fiððrom
—flýgr vøll yfir—
Níðhoggr, náí.
There comes the shadowy dragon flying, glittering serpent, up from Dark of the Moon Hills.
He carries in his pinions
—he flies over the field—
Malice Striker, corpses.
- Nú mun hón sökqvaz. Now will she sink.

60/2 hlautvið] hlutvið H 60/3 ok] er H þurir] so H and, originally, R; see MS. R corrections 25. 60/6 Vitoð — hvat] abbreviated v. e. e. h. R; vitv þ^{er} etc. H 61/8 nióta] here H adds Þa kemr hiñ ríki at regindomi oflugar ofan sa er öllu ræðr. See Problem VI (v). 62/1 Þar] not in H; marginal capital R 62/3 neðan] See MS. R corrections 26. 62/4 Niðafiðllo] See MS. R corrections 27; niða H 62/8 mun] man H

61/1–8 SnE 26 61/1 sér hón] veit ec SnE 61/3 þakðan] so U, W; betra SR, T 61/5 Þar] so SR, U; þann (sc. sal) T, W

INTRODUCTION

1. The Structure of the Poem

Vqluspá, after the manner of visionary poems, is often allusive and enigmatic, with abrupt, unexplained transitions of scene and thought. The structure, or sequence of meaning, is not, therefore, always clear beyond question.

For the text of Vqluspá we have three main sources, and some of the differences between them in order and content are substantial. Without a conception of the structure of the poem we have no basis for determining the best text. At the same time, without some evaluation of the texts we cannot determine the structure. The two studies, poetical and textual, must develop alongside each other.

A tracing of the poet's sequence of thought through each stanza of the poem is given in Vqluspá Introduction II. A detailed comparison of the variant texts, R, H, SnE, is given in Vqluspá Introduction III. As a preface to these two detailed studies, I outline now the broader framework of the poem and the broader differences between its texts.

A. The grand architecture of Vqluspá (1 – 20, 43 – 62)

The grand architecture of the poem is confirmed by all three sources. R and H present a virtually identical text of the opening and close of the poem, the first and last third of it: the birth of the world and its gods is seen to pass into their death, and from that death a fresh world, younger gods, spring. The new world rouses echoes of the old: lines at the close of the poem strike chords that were heard in the beginning. The movement of growth and time is punctuated by refrains, one supplanting, or intruding upon, another, as the sedateness of established order disintegrates before the threat of change, and that threat fulfilled in turn becomes the promise of limitless futurity.¹

One divergence between the texts of R and H could affect our perception of the structure of the poem. Before what is the final stanza in both MSS. (62), a four-line stanza is included in H but not in R. The lines proclaim the coming of an unnamed 'Powerful One', all-ruling, from above, to the ¹ The refrains will be referred to in discussion as Refrain I (Þa gengo regin öll ... 6/1–4, 9/1–4, 23/1–4, 25/1–4), Refrain II (Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat? 27/8, 28/14, 33/8, 34/8, 40/8, 49/8, 59/8, 60/6), and Refrain III (Geyr nú Garmr miðk ... 43/1–8, 46/1–8, 55/1–8).

'Great Divine Judgement/Empire' (the term used, regindómr, is unique and therefore uncertain in meaning). Some scholars have accepted this stanza as the Christian keystone of the poem. I see good reason to discard it as an interpolation.

The third source for the text of Vqluspá is Snorri Sturluson's mythographic colloquy, Gylfaginning (c. 1225). Snorri has known Vqluspá well, citing or paraphrasing over forty stanzas. The chronological course of Vqluspá is preserved within Gylfaginning, in that questions and answers concerning the origins of the cosmos come near the beginning, while those concerning its dissolution and resurgence come near the end—a very obvious chronological pattern, but not one that controls any other Norse mythological poem (though Óðinn's questions in Vafþrúðnismál 20–54 follow, somewhat meanderingly, a similar time-scheme). It is not Snorri's concern, however, to present a narrative of the cosmic cycle comparable to that in Vqluspá, and he does not reproduce the striking thematic links between the old world and the new (as in, for example, 8 and 58), though it is evident that he had before him the stanzas that contained these links. He has planned his opening cosmology on the lines rather of Genesis than of Vqluspá, with the supreme god, creator of all things, as the instigator of the world's being. On to that opening he grafts the native traditions, plundering Vqluspá for cosmological information, selecting and interweaving this with ample matter from other Eddic sources, and adapting his citations to his colloquy schema. The last third of Vqluspá is rendered with less interruption from other material, for here, if we judge by extant texts, there is less detailed material to be gathered from elsewhere. Here Snorri cites a sequence of nine stanzas from Vqluspá, from the sounding of the horn of Heimdallr to the sinking of the earth into the sea.

The structural use of the three refrains in the poem is, of course, not in any way reflected in Gylfaginning, which has a different structure of its own, but Snorri has known all three: Refrains I and II occur in stanzas cited (Refrain I is thus cited twice; SnE 20, 47, 73), Refrain III is echoed in the prose narrative (SnE 72).

Snorri shows no knowledge of the penultimate stanza of H.

There seems to me no reason to think that the text which was omitted where the interpolation of the dwarf stanzas occurs (between 9 and 17) would have significantly altered the structure of the poem.

B. The progress to Ragnarøk (21–42)

In the central third of the poem selected events in the life of the gods are told with acute brevity. They lead to the first portents of Ragnarøk, 'the destiny of the gods'.

This central section of the poem shows the greatest divergence between R and H. R has twenty-two stanzas here, H only fourteen, even omitting any reference to Baldr's death. In R the logic underlying the sequence of selected events is, I think, clear (see Vqluspá Introduction II). The stalemate of the Æsir–Vanir war arises from the power of the Vanir to return to life after death (24): this looks ahead to the return of Baldr. The plot of the giants, the underworld powers, to wed to themselves the seductive Freyja—who maintains by her magic the terrestrial cycle of rebirth after death—would put an end to regeneration in the world of light, including the regeneration of Baldr (25). Outwitting the giants involves the gods in a comedy of errors in which they break their oaths: this lays open the fatal way to the killing of Baldr. He is killed by the mistletoe, the one object on earth that had never sworn not to harm him. Had Loki not been clever enough—in his treacherous disguise—to find out this fact about the mistletoe, Baldr would never have died. And he was the sacrifice necessary for the renewal of the world, after its death at Ragnarøk.

In this mysterious section of the poem the omissions and rearrangements in H obliterate the motivation evident in the text of R and supply no other to take its place. It is clear that H is here greatly inferior to R (see Vqluspá Introduction III).

Snorri cites wholly or partially seven stanzas from this section of the poem (including 28, which H omits) and paraphrases 36 (which H also omits). He thus confirms the text of R, as against H, at these two points.

Snorri cites nothing from the four-stanza sequence relating to the Æsir–Vanir war (21–4), which is in both R and H. He may well not have understood it in detail.

C. The sibylline voices

The poet has given a dramatic form to his great theme for which I know no parallel. He has only a single speaker, but he creates a spirit world for her to converse with. The speaker is 'I', the other is always 'she'. The poet warns us from the outset that even the 'I' is not necessarily a stable human being: she is alive, ostensibly human, addressing a human audience in stanza 1, and yet in stanza 2 she remembers being a primordial fosterling in the giant world of death. The poet is preparing us for a poetic world of heightened imagination, in which vqlur, reincarnated, remembered their former lives, gazed in trance at the hidden habitations of the cosmos, spoke with spirits under the night sky, had constantly close to them, talking, a 'she', a second self, another being, who communicated her own experiences. The poet creates this haunted, reverberating atmosphere well.

Einar Ólafur Sveinsson, commenting on the alternation of the pronouns

ek and hón in Vqluspá, points out that 'it is well known that mediums in trance speak of themselves in the third person; the same happens in the case of the "split personality". The poet has known such phenomena from the vqlur of his own time, and from there it has come into his poem'.² I too would relate the alternation between ek and hón in Vqluspá to mediumistic practice known to the poet, but I would assume, because of his skill, and his reticence, in his use of this device, that he had already learned from the handling of it by other poets. His sophistication in the use of earlier poetic traditions is also evident from the fact that he has for the sibylline structure of his poem chosen two pre-existing sibylline models and interlocked them: (a) that of the didactic vqlva, whose mission is to instruct mankind, like a sibyl in an Oracle (we know of no Norse analogue extant, but the poet may have done so), and (b) that of the prophetic vqlva who tells Óðinn of Baldr's imminent death (a vqlva encountered elsewhere only in Baldrs Draumar). The poet interlocks these two models by using a mediumistic play on the two vqlva-personae, ek and hón. 'I' will be the living, teaching vqlva, who reveals to men her occult knowledge, 'she' the prophetic vqlva, who plays a vital part in the life of the gods themselves. Working—I suggest—from the existing tradition of the prophetic vqlva, the poet has tacitly extended her role in his own poem. He introduces at first an uncharacterized 'she', very distant in time, who 'remembers' the first war in the world (21–4). She could be any kind of spirit communicating with the living vqlva, such as one might expect in a séance. Then, closer in time, and closer to the now perjured gods (26), 'she' reappears, knowing Heimdallr's fears and gazing at the gushing fountain in which Óðinn has uselessly put his faith (27). This 'she' is ready to confront Óðinn with her scorn (28) and rise—with the satisfaction of his bribes—to the height of her prophetic stature (31).

Einar Ólafur summarized briefly the distinct use of 'I' and 'she' in the poem: 'If one examines the text, "I" occurs when the vqlva addresses her audience in the beginning of the poem and when she speaks of her knowledge of past time and of the present (man, veit), while "she" is chiefly used in relation to the future and the vqlva's trance and visions'.³ But as the poet places his references to 'I' and 'she' very sparingly, and if we look at every instance of these pronouns, we can see that his poem has a more intricate dramatic time-structure than Einar Ólafur suggests; not only is 'she' used in relation to the past, at a well-calculated moment in the poem (21), when there is no question of trance or vision, but 'I' is used of seeing into the future—fram sé ek lengra—as one vqlva scornfully outpaces the old knowledge of the other (43, 46, 55). How should we interpret the poet's meaning when for the first and only time he uses the past tense with 'I', in relation to the vision of Baldr's fate (31)? He interrupts the reported narration of the prophetic vqlva's visions, 'she saw . . .' (sá hón vítt ok um vítt . . . Sá hón valkyrior . . . 29/5, 30/1), with a startling change of person, 'I saw . . .' (Ek sá Baldri . . . orlog fólgin, 31/1–4). These cannot be words the prophetic vqlva addressed to Óðinn; she speaks to him in the present tense (28). Should we say that she is now telling the living vqlva of her vision in the past, or that the living vqlva is breaking in, declaring that she too had seen such a vision in the past? Or do they speak in unison of their identical experience? I suggest that the poet has designed this knot of tense and person to be a high dramatic moment on the imagined stage of his séance, when the clocks have melted and both vqlur speak as one, from their different ages directly addressing mankind. The poet is beginning to dismantle his models of 'I' and 'she' and let the outlines of their initial distinctness fade, as the immediate present absorbs them both. After the weeping for Baldr (33), the vqlva saw (sá hón, 34, 37, 38) the otherworld realms of pain and punishment; these are not things of the past, and verbs in the present tense now begin to thread their way through the text.

² Það er alkunna að miðlar í dái tala um sjálfa sig í þriðju persónu, sama gerist við persónuklofning. Þvílík fyrirbrigði hefur skáldið þekkt frá völlum samtímans, og þaðan er það komið í kvæði hans. (324)

³ Ef að er gáð, stendur ek, þegar völván ávarpar áheyrendur í upphafi og þegar hún ræðir um vitund um liðinn tíma og nútíð (man, veit), en hón er helzt viðhaft um framtíð og um leiðslu og sýnir völvunnar. (Sveinsson 324)

Until the old world is dead (54) we are not confronted again by the contrast of two vqlur figures, ek and hón, except in the refrain of 43, 46, 55. Otherwise, an unspecified narrator now suffices—whom we would suppose to be the didactic vqlva of the opening, carrying out her task, with only the repeated refrain cry—Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat?—to remind us of her presence. Why, then, has the poet revived the dichotomy in the refrain stanzas 43, 46, 55? If in these two lines,

*Fiðr veit hón fræða—
fram sé ek lengra,*

hón still refers to the prophetic vqlva and ek to the living vqlva, then the poet has deliberately arranged a role-reversal. The once forward-looking prophetess is regarded as the antiquarian, while the living vqlva (for whom of course Baldr was dead before the prophetic vqlva prophesied it) is now avidly looking ahead at the new events. Yet, ironically, that antiquarian knowledge, that fræði, becomes new news again, when another 'she' sees the great happening of the past repeating itself, and the earth rises 'a second time' for gods to live in (56):

Sér hón upp koma
 þóro sinni iðrð ór ægi iðiaðgræna.

I have referred to hón here as 'another she', not for textual, but for subjective reasons. There is no textual reason why she should not 'be' the prophetic völva 'she' again, 'seeing' in the present tense as in 27/5. Yet at this sudden moment of elation the reader rejoices in the newness of the unexpected visionary 'she', an almost celestial figure in her point of vantage above the rising earth; it seems unnecessary to relate her to any other image in the poem.

The poet is lavish with such surprises. He could, had he wished, have composed Völuspá with a single völva-figure—Pat man ek fólkvíg . . . Veit ek Heimdallar / hlióð um fólgt . . . Valði mér Herfjörðr / hringa ok men . . . Fiðlð veit ek fræða, / fram sé ek lengra . . .—in a way that Snorri would no doubt have preferred. But he has not done so, he has chosen instead the Norse sibyl-line mode of the séance and its spirit voices to 'naturalize' his Christian themes among Norsemen. So he ends his poem, subtly, in the Norse way, with the return of the prophetic spirit to her underworld of silence.

The dramatic frame of the poem is confirmed by R and H (there are fourteen instances of the alternating ek and hón in the parallel sections of the text).

Snorri makes no reference to the contents of the first and last stanzas of Völuspá (in which the dramatic frame of the poem is most clearly revealed), but he refers to the poem as Völuspá (svá segir í Völuspá) and introduces the list of dwarf-names (11 – 16) as the völva's utterance: Ok þessi segir hón nǫfn þeira (SnE 20, 21). In citations that refer to the völva as 'she' in the poem, Snorri has substituted 'I' or another alternative (see Völuspá Introduction III).

The three sources are remarkable testimony to the manners of reception of an Eddic poem by readers of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

II. The Sequence of Ideas: A Reading of the Poem in the Codex Regius Text⁴

A. Prologue: the völva's authority (1 – 2)

Stanza 1 With serene formality a speaker calls for silence from men of all ranks. Though some of the terms she uses—allar . . . kindir, meiri ok minni—suggest wide-ranging variety, she regards her audience in the single light of sanctity. They are hallowed—helgar—by the bond of a common divinity, their descent from a god. That god is Heimdallr, the prime mover of procreation in men, and himself the most archaic of divine births.

⁴ The detailed argument and documentation on which this reading is based are given in the commentary. Translations in the discussion are intended to render the relevant sense of the ON, and are not necessarily identical to those in the parallel translation.

The speaker turns familiarly—so it would seem—to Óðinn, placing upon him the responsibility for the present occasion: 'You wish me to expound in this presence—vel fyr telia—the most ancient news I recall'.

The scene that rises to the mind is of a priestess in a hallowed assembly. Beside her stands a statue of Óðinn, armed: he is Valfjörðr, father of the slain in battle. The living are Heimdallr's sons, the dead are Óðinn's. Her human audience belongs to both.

The confident opening, the casual diction—meiri ok minni . . . Vildo . . .—and the unportentious phrasing of what is required of her—forn spiðll fira, 'the world's old news'—give to the speaker a momentary air of normality.

This is dispelled by the next stanza. She remembers, not at once forn spiðll, but her own infancy long ago: the figures around her, giants, and the landscape, the realms of death.

As she assembles her memories, she reveals her authority: knowledge of Stanza 2 the past learned at the knees of the first inhabitants of the cosmos, and knowledge of the future learned from the prescient dead. Her memory goes to the brink of time: she recalls the nine íviðjur, the 'wood-ogresses' who are the giantess-roots of the world tree: recalls them even before their holy offspring, Heimdallr, was born við iarðar þrǫm, 'at the edge of the earth' (Hyndluljóð 35), when he was still in gestation in the timber of their nine bodies fyr mold neðan, 'underground'.

Though the memories she reveals are awesome, there is no suggestion that she is unhuman. She was fostered by giants, but it is never said that she herself is a giant. She remembers the nine worlds of death beneath the earth, but we are not told that she had been roused from the grave, as the ogress-völva in Baldur's Draumar was roused, irascible and reluctant, by the spells of Óðinn (Baldur's Draumar 4 – 5). On the contrary the poet leaves her nature unidentified and without physical image. Her vast memory invests her with a spiritual dominion, and her presence is wholly purged of the grotesque. She—and through her the poem—is calm, controlled, precise, until the growing horror of events disturbs even her composure.

Her sovereignty of mind, her detachment, are made apparent as she contemplates the mysteries of the cosmos, by the concrete and pragmatic term she uses for the world tree itself. Though transcendental, it is also existential—a miptviðr, a tree of measured sufficiency, supplying the existence of the universe. The poet plays here upon an idiom of husbandry: mipt is a man's correct calculation, measured estimate, of what he needs for his practical purposes, his shelter or his warmth:

Purra skíða	Of dry palings
ok þakinn næfra	and birch bark for roofing
þess kann maðr miqt,	a man can know the measure he needs,
ok þess viðar,	and of the wood
er vinnaz megi	that will suffice
mál ok missere.	for three months and for six.

(Hávamál 60)

The concept of a measured scheme, miqt, for the tree, viðr, confirms the numerical exactitude of nío heima, nío íviðiur. All is planned and ordered, and at the beginning of the world this planned sufficiency appears immense. Yet by its nature all miqt is finite, and fate itself may be seen as a measured thing, miqtuðr (45). In the poet's use—perhaps his coinage—of the term miqtviðr he associates the tree with its measured end.

The poet introduces no further direct reference by the vplva to herself until the tale of the establishment of the cosmos is almost complete (19), but he maintains her allusiveness of style, as of a person speaking of familiar things, a style specially designed for her (there is nothing like it elsewhere in Norse). It is the poet's way, firstly, of condensing the recital of events, and, secondly, of concealing the illogicalities in his mythological synthesis which a fuller exposition would betray.

B. The establishment of the cosmos (3 – 20)

I. The beginnings (3 – 4/4)

The evolution of the world is swiftly depicted in distinct, deftly integrated statements. In realistic terms the myths that the poet integrates are irreconcilable, but because of his brevity and skill in the selection and placing of detail this passes unnoticed.

He uses three independent myths of the origin of the world:

1. That of the giant birth of the world tree, axis of the universe and parent of life (cf. 2, 19).
2. That of the lifting of the first earth out of the primordial ocean (cf. 4).
3. That of the primordial giant corpse from which the earth and sky were fashioned (cf. 3, 4).

The first myth, that of the world tree, the god Heimdallr, son of nine giant mothers, is distinct from the other two myths of origins, in that it articulates a religious mystery; it is not in the first place a narrative legend.

The poet has, on that account, presented the three great images of the tree—its generation (2), its shedding of vital moisture upon the earth (19), its revelation as a sentient god guarding the world (27)—as the direct expression of a vplva's psychic knowledge. The mystery of the tree is familiar and palpable to her. At first (in stanza 2) the poet holds this mystery outside of the chronological narrative of cosmic growth that he is about to give (in stanza 3: Ár var alda . . .). But later he integrates the images of the tree into his narrative theme of time, showing earthly vitality rooted in fate (19) and the axis of the world braced against attack (27). In the last brief glimpse of the tree (45), it is old and shaking, bare of any mystery, a part, now, of the destructible world.

To form the setting for the two remaining myths of the origin of the world, the poet combines three conventional ways of portraying the vacuous condition of pre-existence.

Firstly, he itemizes the familiar furniture of the world that did not yet exist—sand, sea, waves, earth and heaven, and grass—to convey the desolation of absence. The poet of the Wessobrunn Prayer elaborates a similar melancholy picture of desertion—noh sunna ni scein, noh māno ni liuhta, 'neither sun shone, nor moon gave light'—before the world was created by God. Stanza 3

Secondly, he presents a single image of total vacuity, the endless yawning emptiness of the primordial void, the Ginnungagap. This traditional name is, etymologically speaking, a Gordian knot of ancient verbal elements signifying 'gaping', 'vacuous', 'vast', 'potent'. The poet gives a fresh vitality to the old name by reversing its elements and making of it a positive statement: at that time the void existed—gap var ginnunga—in strong contrast to the negatives that surround it.

Thirdly, to provide for the eventual appearance of the earth, the poet turns to the notion of a primordial and seemingly vacuous element from which matter may emerge, namely water. He does not say that it was out of water that earth was first lifted, for he can only retain the haunting negation, 'no sand, no sea, no chill waves', with which he began his cosmogony, without offending the hearer's imagination, if he refrains from stating explicitly immediately in the next stanza that Burr's sons lifted land 'out of ocean'. That he intends this form of creation myth, however, is plain from his later stanza (56), where earth is seen rising 'a second time' out of ocean: Stanza 4

Sér hón upp koma	She sees come up
þðro sinni	a second time
íþrð ór ægi . . .	earth out of ocean . . .

The poet is able to let the image of the empty aboriginal gap pass so smoothly into the implication of an ocean out of which earth may be lifted, for two external reasons: (a) because in other Norse myths, which would be familiar to his audience, the primordial element out of which life first sprang was conceived of as water: so, according to Vafþrúðnismál 31, the first giant body—which is to be the substance of the cosmos—grew out of the freezing spume of waves:

Ór Élivágom	From Snow Storm Waves
stukko eitrdropar:	sprang venom-cold drops:
svá óx, unz varð ór iqtunn . . .	that so grew, till a giant emerged . . .

and (b) because popular Norse superstition (or ironic humour) identified the mythological Ginnungagap with the wildest of real oceans known to Norse sailors, the 'vast chasm of the abyss', inmane baratrum abyssi, as Adam of Bremen called it, that surged at the northern limits of their world, like a remnant of the bleak gulf at the start of time that the ancient myths told of. The reminder of that bleak gulf's name in the deliberately reversed phrasing—gap var ginnunga—effectively makes the transition from the non-existence of the familiar landscape of the known world—sand, sea, waves—to the positive presence of the primordial waters that await their first event, the emergence of earth.

At the head of existence the poet has set the figure of Ymir the giant. He and the gap are the only things that 'are'.

Ár var alda,	It was early in the ages
þar er Ymir byggði.	when Ymir made his dwelling.

Ymir is placed there as a necessary antecedent for Burs synir (4/1), the giant's sons who are to be the first gods and who first lift up land from the primordial waters. That Ymir should have 'dwelt', byggði, gives him anthropomorphic associations, which prepare the imagination for the manual activities of the 'sons of Burr'—ypðo . . . skópo (4/2, 4).

Sporri's version of the first lines of stanza 3 is different:

Ár var alda,	It was early in the ages
þat er ekki var . . .	when nothing existed . . .

Snorri may be following an older poem, and the poet of Vqluspá may have altered it to suit his own. For if, in the context of Vqluspá, without the fullness of Snorri's mythography to guide us, we were told only that 'nothing existed' until these 'sons of Burr' moved on to the scene, where should we suppose they came from? With Ymir there, they are accounted for.

The poet knows that his audience will know at least two traditions about Ymir: (a) that all giants are descended from him: Eru . . . iqtnar allir / frá Ymi komnir (Hyndluljóð 33), and (b) that earth was fashioned out of his flesh: Ór Ymis holdi / var iqrð um skopuð (Vafþrúðnismál 21, Grímnismál 40). He relies on the first tradition to establish Ymir as ancestor of Burs synir. The second tradition, that Ymir's corpse was used as the first primordial solid matter, conflicts with the variant creation legend he has chosen, that land was lifted out of water. He smoothly ignores the contradiction, however, and simply comments that it was the lifters of the land 'who fashioned famed Miðgarðr', er miðgarð / mæran skópo (4/3–4). The myth of the fashioning of earth from Ymir's flesh, sea from his blood, heaven from his skull, is well attested in Eddic and skaldic verse, and the poet's audience would no doubt await some reference to it after the emphatic introduction of Ymir dwelling in space. The poet satisfies them with his swift aside—þeir er miðgarð / mæran skópo—leaving them free to identify biqðom (4/2) with the traditional corpse if they wish and implying that the necessary speed of his narrative will not allow him to specify exactly how this remodelling of primordial matter proceeded—as, for example, the poet of Grímnismál does:

en ór hans brám	and from his [the giant's] eyelashes
gerðo blíð regin	the benign powers made
miðgarð manna sonom.	Miðgarðr for men's sons.

(Grímnismál 41)

The poet eases his audacious synthesis of the two ill-fitting myths by subordinating syntactically, in a relative clause, his allusion to the myth for which he has no structural use. He places his narrative emphasis—biqðom um ypðo—on the form of creation myth that he can use for his cyclic theme. At Ragnarøk the earth sinks into the sea—sígr fold í mar (54)—and when the new era comes, it rises 'a second time' (56).

Of the three legends of cosmic origins that the poet shows he has known, that of earth emerging from the sea is the only one that will serve his cyclic theme. The poet has chosen it for that reason. A second Heimdallr or a second giant corpse could not have represented so spontaneously the natural repetitiveness of cosmic renewal.

2. Sun and moon and the establishment of time (4/5–6)

When the earth is lifted from the waters and Miðgarðr is shaped, the warmth of the sun shining from the south on the stony new realm provokes a verdure that the void notably lacked—gras. The 'grass' in this first age is the glorious, healing 'green leek', that dwarfs all other grasses, for in the first age the commonest things are superlative.

As growth starts, so does time, propelled by the sun and moon. Time is movement, change. From her zenith, her stance in the south, the sun cast her right hand along the edge of the sky. Partnered by the moon, she purposes to set the sky revolving, as it is said in Vafþrúðnismál 23:

Stanza 5

himin hverfa	turn the sky
bau skolo hverian dag	they shall every day
öldom at ártali.	for men to reckon the years.

On that account, in the next stanza of Vqluspá, when the regular turning of the sky has started, the divine powers can name the common units of time—mornings and middays, born out of night—and establish chronology—árom at telia (6/8).

Into this traditional sequence of ideas on the start of time break six incantatory lines of pathetic fallacy: they depict the heavenly bodies in unhoused bewilderment, not 'knowing' their proper place or power. This is in abrupt contrast to the actions of sun and moon in the preceding lines, 4/5–5/4, where all is decisive and well placed: the sun shines correctly from the south, vigorously flings out her stronger hand to grasp the horizon; the moon is, correctly, her travelling companion. In the poem, the first act of the gods in their parliament is not to fix the heavenly bodies in their right places, but to make practical use of a heavenly routine that is clearly already fixed (6/5–10). I would regard lines 5/5–8 as an unskilled interpolation, drawn from a variant version of primordial times and attracted into the poem as a supplement to the repeated negations of stanza 3. The resulting conflict of statements about the behaviour of sun and moon can hardly be the work of the original poet, the most subtle of synthesizers (cf. 4/1–4).

The insertion of 5/5–8 into the text has caused the loss of the poet's second helmingr, just as the insertion of the pula of dwarf-names has caused the loss of the poet's text between stanzas 9 and 17.

To achieve his span of cosmic history the poet has cut traditions sometimes to the briefest of allusions. He does not, for instance, explain the sudden existence of sun and moon. In stanza 6, however, he shows his knowledge of old genealogical legends of the cosmos, when he refers to the times of day as night's 'descendants'. The only Norse accounts before Snorri of the origin of sun and moon are also of a genealogical nature. According to Vafþrúðnismál 23, the sun and moon are children of the same father; the sun herself will have a daughter who, after Ragnarök, will tread her mother's smooth path in the sky (Vafþrúðnismál 47). It would seem likely that in the myths familiar to the poet and his audience it was genealogy that accounted for the sun and moon, just as it did for the times of day, and that we have not lost from the poem any physical account of the creation of sun and moon. Snorri is unique in making the Norse gods establish all the luminaries by taking sparks from Muspellsheimr and setting them in Ginnungagap. He degrades the brother-and-sister Sun and Moon of Vafþrúðnismál tradition into impostors, falsely named by their father, and by so doing betrays the secondary nature of his own myth (SnE 17–18).

3. The gods and the refrain of power (6, cf. 9, 23, 25)

The first hint of civilization, the calculation of time, is accompanied by the protocol of government. Divine powers now emerge, with the trappings of sanctity, responsibility, and rule. The poet has traced their evolution with great economy of words, in a sequence of appellations progressing from the giant proto-gods, Burs synir, cosmic weight-lifters and sculptors of primordial matter, to regin á røkstóla, judicious potencies enthroned, numinous committee-men—ginnheilög goð . . . um þat gættuz—who with due ceremony ensure the smooth maintenance of their universe. This brief picture (6/1–4), which epitomizes the gods' active controlling power as they stride purposefully to their seats, the poet uses as a refrain to link together distinct episodes of the gods' history, until, on the edge of Ragnarök, it shrinks from a vigorous, glowing scene to a small statement—

Æsir ro á þingi The Æsir are in council

—as their power is overwhelmed in the giants' uproar (49).

That the gods are themselves subject to the newly ordered course of time, the poet has indicated by his ambivalent, and unparalleled, term for their thrones: røkstólar. Røk can imply 'authority', but it can also imply 'fate'. The røk, the course of happenings that develops under the gods' control, becomes a destiny—ragnarök—that carries them with it.

4. The golden age (7–8)

The focus on the gods becomes closer: they become more familiar, more secular. We see them in all kinds of activity—building, forging, merry-making, betting—gods in the image of man. The poet now calls them by the cult name men use for them, æsir, and appropriately shows them raising their own temples and altars—archetypes that men will copy—and fashioning wealth, the symbolic basis of good fortune for gods and men. But we may note that the poet also places these fortunate gods upon a plain whose name perpetuates the theme of change that the inauguration of revolving time began: Iðavöllr, the field that comes and goes, retreats, returns.

Relaxing in a grassy meadow over their magical gaming-board, they gamble for gold—they have enough of it to play with:

var þeim vettergis	for them there was no
vant ór gulli.	want of gold.

Their happy game is the image of the radiant first age of the world: no lack, no diminution, a perpetual motion of profit. And no rivalry—they play only against themselves. Their game makes the world go round in felicity, but it has its hazards. Others may want to play it. And indeed their self-satisfaction provokes challenge from a different world, one that had faded from the hearers' memory as the bright cosmos grew. Out of the realms of the giants three young ogresses come with their uncanny powers and bring to an end the gods' wealth of gold. I have suggested—as the poet does not tell us the full story—that the girls play the gods for their board and its golden pieces, and as the gods see they are losing, in their fury of temper they overturn or break the board, refusing to play any more, leaving the gaming pieces fallen on the ground—í túni—not to be picked up until they are found again í grasi, ready for the tafl-game of the next golden age (58).

For the gods of the first world, however, the age of automatic gold is over. They underestimated their giant visitors, just as Fróði did, when he made slaves of two itinerant giant girls—'You chose us for strength . . . but did not ask about ancestry' (Grottasöngr 8)—until in rebellion they shattered his gold-grinding mill-stone.

A perpetually gold-winning board-game, a perpetually gold-grinding mill—to such illusions of permanence the giants will always put an end.

5. Gold-mining dwarfs (9)

Stanza 9

When they lose their birthright of easy gold, the gods arrange for an alternative source, through the creation of creatures who will reside where gold is, in the stony veins of the earth. The dwarfs are to be made of the same elements as the sea and mountains—which are the blood and bones of the cosmic giant Ymir—and they will have their home in his rocky limbs (cf. 49/6, 7).

Now that the gods are no longer their own goldsmiths (cf. 7), it is to the dwarfs that they will turn for their golden needs: a boar for Freyr, an otter's wergild, long hair for the clipped head of Sif (SnE 122–3, 127).

6. An interpolation and lacuna in the text (10 – 16)

Stanzas
10 – 16

The allusion to the creation of the dwarfs in stanza 9 has attracted into the poem from another source the account of their making—out of earth—in stanza 10, followed by a long pula of dwarf-names. This interpolation coincides with the loss of at least one stanza of the original poem. The lost text would have included an introduction to the next event, the creation of man; as it is, this event begins in mid-sentence, 'until . . . '.

7. The first man and woman and the tree of life (17 – 20)

Giants, gods, dwarfs are in existence; only mankind is not yet there. Stanza 17 Though some prelude to the creation of man must be lost from the poem—and no other source supplies this loss—the act itself is clear enough.

The four stanzas 17 – 20 form a finely composed sequence, in which the poet identifies the kinship of man and world tree.

Moved by the impulse of power and benevolence—öflgir ok ástgir—three Æsir come to the 'house' that is Miðgarðr, as yet empty of man. They find on the shore, á landi—for Miðgarðr is surrounded by seas—two bits of wood, Ask and Embla, with no powers and no destiny—örlogglausa.

Their inert state of impotence, like that of the empty primordial world (3), is itemized in negatives.

All the elements of life that Ask and Embla do not possess the Æsir Stanza 18 punctiliously supply. The gifts they give have a rich ambiguity, as if the poet meant to arrest the hearers' attention with the fullness of the senses of his words. Life and breath—önd—are given as one gift. Divine inspiration and the immortal intellect—óð—are given as another. The physical gifts—the covering of flesh and blood—lá—on the wooden bones, the graces of manners and utterance—læti—and the wholesome colouring and countenance of humanity—lito góða—come last. These new beings are not primitive or simple physically or mentally, but as subtly endowed as Milton's first pair.

As if in response to this tale of the first human Ask, the volva's mind Stanza 19 turns to the world tree. She arrests her narrative of events to affirm the existence of a greater Askr towering—hár baðmr—over the valleys of the world: Ask veit ek standa. She depicts it gleaming with fecundity, nourishing the earth: a tree no longer in the womb of ogresses underground (2), but green against the sky. Both Askar, parent tree and human branch, have been radiantly transfigured by their emergence into life.

But for both Askar this life in them is inseparable from fate. The great Stanza 20 Askr stands evergreen over the well of fate, as if the greenness—litir góðr—were dependent upon the water of destiny at its roots. The human Askr was örlogglauss before he breathed with life, but with his 'birth' fatal entities of time—Past, Present, and Future—determine his destiny, as surely as the norms twine the strands of fate—örlogbættir—for the infant hero Helgi (Helgakviða Hundingsbana I 2 – 3).

The poet has drawn together in these four stanzas, 17 – 20, several distinct traditional notions: he links each one of these notions to another by a single point of likeness. The myth of the fashioning of the first man and woman out of wood is linked to the myth that the world tree is the parent of mankind: the bridge between them is the common material—the ǵla—of man and tree. The world tree has at its foot a well of fate. In that water women-of-the-lake live, who emerge to determine the destinies of men. So the poet moves, conjoining, from Askr to Ask, from brunnr to sær, to the three lake-maidens, wise from the oracular element they inhabit, who come to cut upon the material of man himself—a piece of wood—á skiði, the lottery mark, the rune, that decides his fortune.

The original condition of fatelessness of the two wooden pieces—ørlogglausa—which seemed so pathetic at the opening of the sequence, finds ironic rectification at the close, with the institution of the fatal lottery, ørlog seggia, into which the marked man, the wooden lot, is cast.

C. Progress to Ragnarök and the dissolution of the world (21–53)

This complex central part of his history the poet has designed as a preparation, narrative, moral, and emotional, for his depiction of the ending and renewing of the world. For his new purpose the poet introduces a new sibylline perspective, that of a völva explicitly contemporary with crucial events in the life of the gods, to whom they turn for her superior powers of vision (on the völva figures see Völuspá Introduction 1.C).

1. Narrative prelude: three events before Ragnarök (21–33)

Out of the rich variety of 'events' in the myths of the gods known to him, the poet has selected three for his purpose:

1. The divine war of Æsir and Vanir.
2. The giant builder's attempt to possess the goddess Freyja, the sun and moon.
3. The killing of Baldr.

The poet links these events thematically both with each other and with the cyclic course of Ragnarök and the world's renewal. I hope to make this clear as each event is discussed in detail.

The poet's version of these three myths is allusive in the extreme: riddling for us, with our fragmentary knowledge of the traditions he knew, and, no doubt, demanding enough for his original audience. He expects a very full acquaintance with the narratives behind his allusions (e.g. in stanza 25) and a mental agility quick to catch the connections he is making, perhaps for the first time, between distinct myths. His presentation of a story may be in an epitome so succinct that events are telescoped, and a single word or phrase may be designed to bring a host of relevant associations into play without weakening the focus of the verse by fuller exposition. The details he chooses to select from his sources, and to stress most vividly, indicate his poetic intentions. His enigmatic style reaches its height in this section of the poem.

(i) The divine war of Æsir and Vanir (21–24)

There are two wars fought in the poem, the first in the world and the last. Stanza 21 The first ensures that the gods will have the power to survive the second.

The living völva (as I shall call her), who speaks of herself as 'I' in stanzas 1, 2, 19, now reports the memories of a second völva figure, 'she', who communicates with her:

Þat man hón fólkvíg, She remembers the war, fyrst í heimi . . . the first in the world . . . (21)

In her recollections of this war six scenes stand out. The first scene is not, however, as we might expect, a scene of pitched battle between armies—fólkvíg—but of an attack upon an individual, a female. Gullveig—whose name associates 'gold' with two known senses of veig, 'martial strength' and 'intoxicating drink'—was struck with spears and burnt. Neither form of assault killed her: after the third burning, as the völva comments, in the present tense, 'she still lives' (þó hón enn lifir). I suggest that the Æsir—for she is burnt in Óðinn's hall (21/5–6)—are desecrating and trying to destroy a golden image of the 'bride of the Vanir', Vanabrúðr Freyja, whose divinity characteristically manifests itself in a multiplicity of distinct figures with distinct names (SnE 38, 126).

We have a parallel for just such a female idol as I take Gullveig to be—gold-adorned, and with the sensual and warlike propensities of Freyja—in the tutelary goddess of Jarl Hákon, Þorgerðr Hølgabrúðr. Legendary tradition claimed that she defeated the formidable Jömsvíkingar for him in 994, bringing against them storm and colossal hailstones. She was herself seen fighting in Hákon's host, each finger launching an arrow, each arrow reaching its prey. Gullveig's fighting role in the Æsir–Vanir war might have been of this magical kind, while her golden idol would remain in its temple, vulnerable to the Æsir, just as Þorgerðr's idol was to Óláfr Tryggvason.

When the Æsir try to stop Gullveig's hostile witchery by burning her, they find she is an indestructible elixir, reborn purified—as burnt gold will be—from every killing. When Óláfr sets fire to Þorgerðr, she is burnt to ashes. For the Christian, her power of renewal no longer exists.

The poet avoids any exposition of the motives and strategies of the war; we are meant to know them. He confines his narrative to the völva's memories of actions that convey the vehemence and frustration of the Æsir in their dealings with the Vanir.

The second scene from the Æsir–Vanir war recalls the insidious passage Stanza 22 of this bright, elusive deity—now in human form with a human vplva's name, Heiðr—through the homes of men, as vplva and seiðkona, prophesying prosperity, seducing human society into allegiance to her cult—the cult of the Vanir—by the fascination of the occult practices of seiðr and the ribaldries of its rituals. To those who do not subscribe to such a cult—the Æsir, for instance—these rites are repellent, obscene, reprehensible, and corrupting to the women-folk, who model themselves on Freyja, their favourite—an 'ill Vanabrúðr' to the Æsir—palpably manifest in her seiðkona.

Stanza 23 With the Vanir gaining so strong a hold on the hearts of men, the Æsir could see their own worship and tribute waning. The third scene from the vplva's memory is of the powers striding once again to their thrones, to ask themselves in indignation whether they should endure such loss, share the revenues of godhead with the Vanir, allow them to join with them in a single sacred community.

Stanza 24 On the heels of their question comes the next scene from the past. Óðinn flung his spear over the Vanir host. The powers in council must—we assume—have decided upon a negative answer and determined to reject the upstarts.

Here the poet emphasizes that the primordial war was not as yet over—þat var enn fólkvíg/fyrst í heimi. As it was the first war in the world, this would be the first time that Óðinn had used his magic spear-cast, which was to become—in tradition—his unbeatable military trick, dooming his enemies to defeat and death. On this occasion, however, it did not have that effect, for the two last swift scenic glimpses are of the Vanir's successes: the Æsir's wooden ramparts have been shattered, and the Vanir are not corpses on Óðinn's field of slaughter, doomed by his spear, but alive, digging their heels into that field with vigour—knátto . . . vpllo sporna. The phrase the poet uses here resembles one used of the successful birth of two babes who 'kicked the ground' when released from the womb by the incantations of Oddrún:

ríkt gól Oddrún	powerful charms Oddrún chanted,
ramt gól Oddrún	potent charms Oddrún chanted,
bitra galdra	savage spells
at Borgný.	over Borgný.
Knátti mæð ok mögr	A girl and a boy
moldveg sporna . . .	kicked the ground . . .

(Oddrúnargrátr 7–8)

The poet—I suggest—has telescoped his narrative of the war, focussing on the success of the Vanir and omitting to state what preceded it. If, however, we follow the hint of parallelism in phrases knátto . . . vpllo sporna and knátti . . . moldveg sporna, and note that the term 'born' is used of the revival of Gullveig after her burning (21/7–8):

þryssvar brendo	three times they burned her
þryssvar borna . . .	three times reborn . . .

we could suppose that the Vanir—like Gullveig—have revived 'reborn' from Óðinn's spear-cast—perhaps frequently repeated, opt, ósialdan—and the Æsir find to their dismay that their victims are—as she was—'still living'.

There is a significant parallel to this military situation in the legend of the Hjaðningavíg—the battle, or slaughter, of the men of Heðinn. That víg became a perpetually renewed battle, when Hildr Hognadóttir each night raised the slain forces of her father and of her abductor, Heðinn, so that each day the killing might continue until Ragnarök (SnE 153–5).

The poet of Vqluspá tells us that it is through a form of magic utterance—vígspá—that the Vanir are able to walk the earth again. It is by magic utterance too that Oddrún, acting as 'earth-mother', or midwife, brings the vigorous children to birth. The poet Bragi, who tells of the Hjaðningavíg, does not, in the stanzas that Snorri cites from the Ragnarsdrápa, specifically attribute magic utterance to Hildr, but he calls her a witch, fordæða, and adds an ironic epithet, fengeyðandi, 'booty-wasting', pointing out the fact that by so assiduously raising up the dead from the battlefield and allowing neither side to be the conqueror, she deprives the pillager of his accustomed revenue.

As a witch and a commander of the dead, Hildr—a Norse Bellona, for her name means 'War'—reflects the character of the goddess Freyja. Freyja is the arch-witch, mistress of seiðr (Loki calls her fordæða, Lokasenna 32), and she has authority over the dead equal to Óðinn's:

hálfan val	half of the slaughter
hón kýss hverian dag,	she selects every day,
en hálfan Óðinn á.	and half Óðinn has.

(Grimnismál 14)

Hildr brings the dead to life. Freyja brings the living into the world; she has the talisman of birth, the necklace-girdle drawn from the sea. In the Norseman's metaphor, resurrection from death is a birth, and death a gestation of life. In this realm of transformations Freyja's power lies.

By building upon these traces of analogy in other texts with the events and ideas glimpsed in the allusive text of Vqluspá, we can see the outlines of the myth that underlay the truce between the Æsir and the Vanir, their union in a single divine 'guild' (gildi).

As Snorri says, the war of the Æsir and Vanir ended because neither side could vanquish the other (Ynglinga Saga ch. 4). The deadlock was only resolved by their union. By this union the unfailing killing power of Óðinn was united with the unfailing regenerative power of Freyja. Death became no more than the necessary condition for the renewal of life, a sacrifice made to ensure the future. So Freyja became, in social terms, the gods' blótyðja, their 'priestess of sacrifice' (as Snorri says). Her magic knowledge, her seiðr, ensured that their sacrificial rites did not fail.

(ii) The giant builder's attempt to possess the goddess Freyja (25–26)

The war between the Æsir and the Vanir had changed the constitution of the gods, and introduced into the Æsir community deities who were professionally, as it were, masters in the art of reviving life after death—an art the gods will have great need of at Ragnarök.

Stanza 25

In the next episode their possession of this divine power is threatened. Now the gods see how disastrous it would have been if the Vanabrúðr—the goddess whom the Æsir had once tried to destroy—had indeed been lost. Again the giants are encroaching. They had put an end to the golden age of the gods (8), and now they plan to possess Freyja and steal away the divine power to live again. It is to this myth that the poet now alludes.

Assuming that his audience will know the outcome of the gods' famous first war without further exposition, the poet moves on, letting the tale of the giant who came to the gods disguised as a stone-mason (unctuously offering to build a wall round Ásgarðr 'as a protection against the giants') fit into his text as a natural consequence of the war. For the gods badly need a replacement for their battered wooden borðveggr (24), and who could provide it better than one of those legendary rock-shifters, the giants? (cf. Grottasngir 11). And the giants, no doubt, have noted that the gods have a beautiful new goddess. A wall for a wife. What exchange could be better?

The full tale of this comedy is told only by Snorri (SnE 45–7). The disguised giant offered the gods a contract: he would build the wall in three seasons and receive as fee Freyja and the sun and moon. The gods converted this offer into a wager: the builder must finish the wall in a single winter, and if any scrap of the work remained undone by the first day of summer, he would get nothing from them. And he must have no man to help him. He therefore asked if he might have the help of his horse. It was Loki who advised that he should. With predictably frightening results.

From the story the poet reproduces only two scenes: (a) the council of all the powers when they found themselves on the brink of disaster, and (b) the smashing of the presumptuous giant by Þórr. In (a), the council scene, the poet shows what the gods saw in their appalled thoughts. The poet knows that his audience will know that the builder was about to complete the wall—with the help of his herculean horse—in the impossibly short time deliberately fixed for him, and that he would at any moment carry off with him his wages—Freyja and the sun and moon—solemnly pledged to him by oath-bound covenant.

The gods in council had seen the builder's progress; they knew that the first day of summer would be their last dawn. Already the air about them seemed lævi blandit—malignly touched by the deadliness of perpetual dark; they saw Freyja already delivered, wedded, to the builder. She was not now a sensual witch in their eyes—an ill brúðr—but a tragic figure, that 'girl of Óðr's' who wept golden tears, and was lovely even in her weeping—it grátfagra goð (SnE 38, 110, 126).

By the swift allusion in his phrase Óðs mey, the poet recalls the mourning aspect of the goddess, when she goes, Isis-like, seeking her departed husband (as Snorri tells). This is her winter wretchedness, her barrenness, and that of the world in sympathy with her. If she were lost for ever to the gods, that winter of the world would never end. Such a fear gives a foretaste of Ragnarök, when the sunshine would grow black (40) and a monstrous winter ravage the earth (Vafþrúðnismál 44).

Who had brought the gods to this pass? They looked round for a culprit. The poet gives the lightest of verbal touches to show the answer to their questions. The culprit was, as usual, their redeemer. If the air—lopt—seemed laced with ruin—lævi blandit—who would be responsible but Loptr himself, Loki inn lævisi, connoisseur of disaster, expert in blending evil with the good things of the gods, whether it is their mead—blend ek þeim svá meini mið (Lokasenna 3)—or their air.

Omitting any hint of the hilarious solution that Loki hit upon—to turn himself into a filly and lure away the builder's indispensable stallion, so that the wall could not be finished in time—the poet focuses on the last scene of the story (which seems in Snorri's version no more than a conventional epilogue): the killing of the builder, now exposed as a giant, by Þórr. Explaining nothing, the poet shows only a furious Þórr leaping up with zealous satisfaction to annihilate the giant—for who would keep an oath to such a monster?

Á gengoz eiðar,	Violated were the oaths,
orð ok særi,	the vows and sworn pledges,
mál þll meginlig,	all the words of weight
er á meðal vóro.	that were between them.

All done in one explosive moment.

In his intensely cryptic presentation of this tale, the poet throws into relief three of its constituent elements:

1. The compulsive disastrousness of Loki inn lævisi that almost destroys the world.

2. The figure of the weeping goddess, who can no longer hope for a living lord when she is married into the giant realm of death (cf. Skírnismál 31, 35).
3. The error of the indignant gods when they break their oaths to the deceitful giant.

These narrative elements find their counterparts—another mischief of Loki's, another goddess weeping, other oaths made vain—in the next event, the killing of Baldr.

(iii) The killing of Baldr and its prelude (26–32)

(a) The oaths. In stanza 26 the poet has a double purpose in emphasizing the broken oaths: he means (i) to warn his audience that the error was ominous, and (ii) to indicate the price that the gods paid for it. This was not just another case of a ring-oath cynically sworn and broken by Óðinn (Hávamál 110), for which he is never penalized. These oaths sworn by the gods to the giant—even though he deceived them—had consequence.

A contrast in tone between the two halves of stanza 26 underlines the gravity of the oath-breaking. The first half is emotional, fiery with rage and triumph, the second is objective, heavy with reckoning, as the weight of the sworn oaths is borne in on the mind—eiðar, orð, særi, mál meginlig. There is irony, at once comic and ominous, in Þórr's swelling sense of moral outrage at the giant's impudence—

hann sialdan sitr,	he seldom sits idle
er hann slíkt um fregn!	when he hears such a thing!

when he is committing a moral error himself, breaking the oaths of the gods.

It is ancient knowledge that oath-breaking will have ugly consequences, as the valkyrie Sigrdrífa warns her hero:

Grimmar limar [MS. simar]	Bitter branches
ganga at trygðrofi.	go to troth-breaking.
Arm er vára vargr.	Wretched is the ravener of vows.

(Sigrdrífumál 23)

Within the story of the giant builder, however, as Snorri tells it, there are no ominous consequences to the gods' oath-breaking. The gods win the wager, and the giant was simply a fool to trust them. But a Norse poet, whose subtle profession trained him in the perception and exploitation of likenesses and parallels, could observe—from his stock of myths—that 'a time would come' in the traditional history of the gods when they also would put their trust in oaths, and they would be fooled too. This time the oaths are not broken, but deficient: there is one oath unsworn—the mistletoe's—that destroys the rest, justifying the proverbial fear: Eið láta þú ... einn ... alla verða, 'Do not let one oath invalidate all' (Sigvatr Þórðarson, Vestrfararvísur 8).

In his emphasis on the gods' oaths, giving all the synonyms for 'oath' in a manner that suggests a binding legal formula as well as the great number and variety of oaths sworn, the poet points ahead to the innumerable solemn oaths that every creature, every substance swears not to harm Baldr. Once again we depend on Snorri for a full story (SnE 63–5). When Frigg has exacted all these oaths, and had them witnessed, the gods have a heady sense of security. For a halcyon moment they are convinced that their charmed life can go on for ever. They devise a sport—skemtun—out of the saving oaths. Exultantly (þótti þetta öllum mikill frami, as Snorri says) they pelt Baldr and hack at him, unable to hurt him, on the very ground of their sacred assembly. Tempting providence. So the envious and assiduous Loki, resenting Baldr's impunity (líkaði honum illa, er Baldr sakaði ekki), finds out that Frigg had thought one thing too young to take the oath, the mistletoe, and she had never asked it. It is the one 'weapon' that can kill Baldr without breaking an oath.

With ingenious succinctness, to show the fatal link he is making between the breaking of the oaths that assure the giant builder's safety and the circumventing of the oaths that protect Baldr's life, the poet lets the second happening be 'read into' the account of the first by using phrases with double meaning.

So, á gengoz eiðar (26/5) may signify 'oaths were infringed, violated', but also 'oaths had equivalent rating', in legal terms 'cancelled each other out'. The phrase á gengoz occurs with this second significance in Reykðæla Saga ch. 18, after the fight at Geirastaðir: sú var gørð þeira, at á gengusk vígin húskarlanna, 'this was the settlement they made, that the killings of the house-carls were reckoned equivalent, cancelled each other out'. In Vqluspá, in an instant of insight into fate's balance sheet, the vqlva has seen the gods' perjury as 'paid for' by the killing of Baldr.

The phrase that closes this stanza—á meðal vóro [MS. fóro—may also be endowed with a double meaning. Oaths and solemn affirmations 'were [MS. went] between' the gods and the builder, when they made their commercial pact and gave gríð—promise of personal safety—to the builder. Similar oaths of gríð 'existed, stood, intervened between' Baldr and his death.

For the translation parallel to the text I have adopted this second reading.

By associating the two ineffectual oath-swearings through verbal ambiguity at this moment of the killing of the giant, the poet implies—for those who understand his riddle—that a moral judgement resides in the forn røk—the ancient course—of events. The myth of the giant builder will have been chosen as the ‘second event’ before Ragnarøk, (i) because it dramatically unveiled the dangers of Ragnarøk ahead, now escaped by a hair’s breadth: no sun, no moon, no life renewed each year, and (ii) because it contained the motif of oath-swearing and oath-breaking which could be brought into ominous relationship with his ‘third event’ before Ragnarøk, the killing of Baldr. No other myth that we know could have served so well.

Stanza 27 (b) The vplva involved: a vpluspá within Vpluspá. From the note of ill-omen sounded by the oath-breaking in stanza 26, the poet develops a theme of dread. He never again shows the divine world as a scene of carefree gaming, or confident giant-smashing, or even of dignified councils, but as a world of gods secretly on guard, in the darkness of night probing the future.

The cause of this change in the gods’ world is the premonition they are given of Baldr’s death, the intimation of their own mortality, when Baldr has unquiet dreams (Baldrs Draumar 1), just such dreams as haunt a human hero before his killing.

To open the theme of dread, the poet does not tell of Baldr’s evil dreams, but reverts instead to the figure of the vplva, the eye-witness of the deeds of the gods, whom he first introduced into the poem for her recollections of the gods’ first war:

Þat man hón fólkvíg	She remembers the war,
fyrst í heimi . . .	the first in the world . . .

At that point in the poem, the verb ‘remembers’, though in the present tense, did not evoke the immediate presence of the vplva. ‘Remembering’ kept her in the past, aloof from the happenings of the present, and the narrative of the deeds of the gods—their war, their wager with the giant builder—unfolded without any further reference to her. But now, in the shadow of the oath-breaking, she emerges as intensely alive, herself an actor in events, knowing and seeing—Veit hón . . . sér hón—in the present moment (27).

What she knows and sees are the anxieties of the gods in the face of Ragnarøk. Her insights spring from the tree and the well, the secret heart of the world, and are expressed in visionary terms.

(1) Heimdallr as watchman. Beneath the holy tree that is heiðvanr—‘accustomed to bright mead’ from the well at its foot—the vplva ‘knows’ that the miraculous hearing (hlióð) of Heimdallr is couched. Tree of the world, he is the divine sentinel. To catch all sounds, his ‘ear’ is to the ground, where his tree-roots in the nine realms of the underworld attend the vibrations of the giants’ coming.

She knows that beneath the tree the sound (hlióð) of Heimdallr’s horn lies silent. It will be heard at Ragnarøk (45). Until then the horn stays, a drinking horn for the mead of wisdom, by the well at the foot of the tree. Sigrdrífa speaks of this horn, dripping runes, in a distinct mythological context in Sigrdrífumál 13 (see (2) below).

The poet here employs the two senses of hlióð to recall both Heimdallr’s ‘hearing’ and his ‘sound’—that is, his echoing horn. Like any good sentinel, he hears and is heard.

It is by the second implicit allusion, to the horn of alarm, that the full significance of the vplva’s knowledge at this particular moment of time is conveyed, because it gives the new immediate context of Heimdallr’s ‘listening’. Heimdallr—vprðr goða—has always listened, but whereas once what he heard were sounds of life—the wool growing on sheep’s backs or the grass growing on the ground (SnE 33)—now it will be sounds of death, of the giants’ coming.

By deliberately imposing, in hermetic manner, the ‘sound’ of alarm upon the ‘listening’ of the god, the poet turns what would have been a piece of commonplace mythological knowledge—as, for example, in Snorri: ‘Heimdallr . . . is watchman of the gods and sits there at heaven’s end to guard against hill-giants’ (SnE 32–3)—into a dramatic and specifically timed anticipation of Ragnarøk.

(2) Óðinn’s old-world runes—Fimbultýs fornar rúnar. The hint of a visual element in the first half of the stanza, in the image of the tree, is vividly developed in the second, as the vplva’s thought moves from what she knows to what she sees. The bright mead that is the tree’s nurture (cf. heiðvqnom) appears to her now as a river welling up with loamy—that is, fertile—flood from the ‘pledge’ (veð) of Óðinn. This pledge is his own eye, deposited in the well of Mímir at the foot of the tree (as the vplva’s words to Óðinn in the next stanza indicate, 28/7–13). According to Snorri (SnE 22), Óðinn gave this pledge for a drink of mead from that well of knowledge.

No single extant myth corresponds to the vplva’s vision of a fertile river gushing from Óðinn’s eye. To create for the vplva a vision that relates directly to his theme at this moment of the poem—the approach of Ragnarøk—the poet has drawn elements from three variant legends of Óðinn’s acquisition of wisdom.

The primary legend that the poet uses is that of Óðinn’s bargain with Mímir, an eye for a drink. This explains why Óðinn’s eye is in the mead-well of Mímir (28) and why it should be called a ‘pledge’ (27). But it does not explain the gushing river—á sér hon ausaz. This is illuminated, however, by stanzas 13 and 18 – 19 of Sigrdrífumál.

In a mysterious and elaborate sequence the sagacious valkyrie Sigrdrífa traces the origin of the flow of wisdom—symbolized as ‘thought-runes’, hugrúnar—into the world of gods, elves, and men. Here wisdom is not a draught that Óðinn has drunk and regurgitated for the benefit of the world, as in the case of the mead of poetry stolen from the giants. By a more subtle and magical process he ‘interpreted’ (réd) the thought-runes, ‘carved them’ (reist) and ‘pondered them’ (um hugði) ‘from out of the liquid’ (af þeim legi) that had brimmed over from a skull and a horn, which, it would seem, rose from, or hung over, the well of mead.

These runes of heady provenance were carved on innumerable objects—on the teeth of Óðinn’s horse Sleipnir, on the nail of a norn, on a bear’s paw . . .—then scraped off and stirred about in ‘the holy mead’—hverfðar við inn helga mið—and sent far and wide—á víða vega—into the world. These runes, thus moistened with sanctity, may be used for good fortune—at heilom—as long as the world lasts, that is, until the powers are rent—unz riúfaz regin—at Ragnarøk.

Sigrdrífa establishes an image of Odinic runic wisdom as a world-flooding stream originating in mead and sanctified by mead, but she does not use any term that suggests this branching flow of wisdom was fecundating (cf. á . . . aurgom forsi). The association of wisdom and fertility is found, however, not only in the punning use of fróði, ‘wise and fertile’, as an epithet for Freyr in Skírnismál I, 2, but also in the context of Óðinn’s acquisition of the mead of poetry, when he describes his new vitality after a drink of the precious mead—drykk . . . ens dýra miðar—from the giant’s cave:

Dá nam ek frævaz Then I began to grow fecund ok fróðr vera . . . and be wise . . .

(Hávamál 141)

Here in Hávamál, as in Sigrdrífumál, there is a tone of rejoicing over the wisdom that Óðinn has brought into the world, a sense of confidence in a future rich in the promise of power through knowledge. This is not so in Vqluspá. The vqlva’s sardonic tone borders on insult when she tells Óðinn that she knows where he has ‘hidden’ his eye (much as Loki mocks Týr for lacking the hand that he had pledged, for the sake of all the gods, in the jaws of the chained wolf, Lokasenna 38). There is no suggestion in her words (28/7–13) that Óðinn’s act was either laudable or fruitful. For times have changed. When Óðinn acquired wisdom as the legends in Hávamál and Sigrdrífumál tell, he was like a culture-hero in the early world, when the rending of the powers seemed a long way off (there can hardly be any irony in the phrase unz riúfaz regin in the context of Sigrdrífumál 19). In Vqluspá, by contrast, allusion to Óðinn’s acquisition of wisdom is not made in the course of the history of the early world (which the vqlva tells, 3–20), but near its end, as Ragnarøk draws close. It is at this ominous moment that the poet has chosen to emphasize the bitterest variant of the legends of Óðinn’s acquisition of wisdom, the forfeit of his eye, and to impose upon the vision of the god’s traditional benefaction, the fructifying mead of wisdom—here the river aurgom forsi—a grotesque image of his futile sacrifice, veð Valföðrs, the eye in the well.

The poet demonstrates the futility of the forfeit by placing immediately after it the first instance of the vqlva’s challenging refrain—‘Do you still seek to know? And what?’ Óðinn has given half of his sight to gain knowledge, and yet here he comes to the vqlva (28), craving her knowledge and her foresight, because his own fail him. His wise powers are being outpaced by time and in the new world will be talked of as things of the past—Fimbultýs fornar rúnar (57). The stream of Odinic wisdom, the hugrúnar, his brainchildren, the fræði that fecundates with the rich flood that the vqlva now sees, will last no longer than Óðinn himself—unz riúfaz regin.

From the veiled premonitions of Ragnarøk in stanza 27 until the last cockcrow before the giant’s attack (43), the poet moves his scenes to and fro in time and tense, reflecting the tightening links between past, present, and future in the vqlva’s thought. Her professional cry—Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat?—rings out now at all moments of time, a refrain in response to perennial anxiety.

(3) The vision of Baldr’s fate—orlög fölgín. The vqlva’s awareness of the Stanza 28 apprehensions of the gods is set in the present (27); the following scene, of her prophecy to Óðinn of Baldr’s fate, is set in the past (28). Despite the ‘dislocation’ of time, the apprehensions anticipate the scene. Óðinn comes, aged but still terrible—if we may so interpret the nonce name Yggiungr—bearing with him the fears of the Æsir that Baldr’s bad dreams have roused.

By direct narrative and direct speech, the poet makes Óðinn’s visit to the vqlva the scene of closest focus in the poem.

She was sitting out in the night communing with spirits, when the old one came. The motif of his sight—veð Valföðrs—recurs with narrative force. He looked into her eyes—í augo leit—to exert his will on her. By his look she knew he was going to try her—vex her—with some exacting and painful question: Hvers fregnið mik? / Hví freistið mín? The plural verb—elsewhere she addresses him as þú—shows that she knew he came with the question of all the gods. The attack of his glance she countered with a taunt of words, the betrayal of his secret. She could see as he looked at her that he had only one eye, and she knew well enough where he had put the other: Alt veit ek, Óðinn, / hvar þú auga falt! Mimir can breakfast every morning from that mead, a single sip of which cost you—Óðinn!—your eye. That is the tone of her sour raillery.

Stanza 29 But the temptation of his glittering bribes dispelled her hostility, and avaricious pleasure released her powers. Her sight ranged effortlessly through every world. She might seem to be oblivious of Óðinn's presence, but her whole message is directed to him (stanza 31).

Stanza 30 In her wide gazing her attention was arrested by a cavalcade out of the distance, valkyries directing their course to the realm of the gods—tílgöðþjóðar. Scenting battle, they came to choose the slain, closing in, raven-like, for Hqðr's—'Battle's'—defeat of the 'Prince'. They were coming to the land of the gods for Baldr's death, as they came for that of Hákon—the good konungmaðr—to Norway (as Eyvindr tells in Hákonarmál).

Stanza 31 Her sight of distant worlds, of valkyries riding, the poet presents in objective narrative form: 'she saw . . . she saw . . .'. For the central insight of her vision, the apparition of Baldr with blood on him, the poet changes to the direct speech of the völva herself: 'I saw . . .'. She is now speaking not only to Óðinn, but to the living völva and her human audience, telling them what once she had to tell him: so urgent is her message (see Völuspá Introduction I. C).

For the climax of the völva's prophetic vision of Baldr's death, the poet reverts to the compressed and hermetic style of stanza 27, her earlier occult intuitions.

It would seem from the sequence of her images that she first saw an apparition of Baldr bleeding, and then the sight of the mistletoe that became the spear that killed him. In the placing of her phrases priority is given to the tragic end, the shock of feeling, as she makes the bleeding body of the god strike the mind of her audience first, before any word of the cause of it. The poet does not, however, make her say sensationally, 'I saw Baldr covered in blood'. He makes her subordinate the visual fact of what she saw to her recognition of the determining force that underlay the killing, the latent fate—'I saw the fate set hidden—ørlog fylgin—for Baldr, covered in blood'.

But ørlog can be plural in sense as it is in form. Baldr's death is not the whole of her vision. By the end of the stanza we can perceive that her statement is a revelation of not one destiny, but two. Baldr's death is presaged by the sight of blood on him. His return to life after death is prefigured by the plant that killed him.

The poet has made the image of the high-growing twig tranquil and precise: Stóð um vaxinn . . . miór ok miøk fagr. The völva was struck by its maturity—vaxinn. Frigg had once thought the mistletoe too young to take the oath to spare Baldr, but now it was vaxinn, 'adult', grown into an active agent of death—harmflaug (32)—when set in motion by Loki inn lævisi. The fairness and fragility of the plant were, then, deceptive, for it could kill.

Within the signs of tragic deception in the slender plant, however, the völva saw the tracings of great promise, for proverbially miór er mikils vísir, 'tiny is the tendril of a mighty growth' (see the lausavísa attributed to Óttarr svarti, Flatayjarbók III. 243). The description of the mistletoe as miór, 'slender', is not simply realistic, but weighted with proverbial implication. The thin twig will have great consequence.

Deliberately, as he constructs the magical glimpse of the mistletoe, the poet withholds the secret that it is the mistletoe he is describing until the last line of the stanza. Until that line, elements in the vocabulary that the poet uses rouse associations of Baldr, half suggest that the god himself is being described—not bloody and prostrate with death, but erect and vital with growth, young and radiant as ever. The words stóð . . . vøllom hæri recall an idiom such as mikill á vallarsýn ('tall from a sight of him on level ground') used of a man's stature. The slenderness—miór—would fit well the youthfulness suggested by the phrase Óðins barn. Barn is nowhere else used of a god: so Sturla Þórðarson writes of his thirteen-year-old daughter after the ordeal of the Flugumýrr burning, as of one too young to suffer: Var hon mjök þrekuð, barn at aldri, 'She was greatly exhausted, a child in years'. And the great beauty—miøk fagr—which has to some scholars seemed wholly inappropriate as an epithet for the mistletoe, recalls the proverbial physical perfection of Baldr, svá fagr álitum ok bjartr, svá at lýsir af honum, 'so gleamingly fair of countenance and so bright, that radiance shines from him' (SnE 29). Over this evocation of Baldr's living presence the poet then imposes the identity of the mistletoe, lending to the dying god the mistletoe's evergreen connotation of survival through winter's death. The mistletoe is transfigured—miøk fagr—in likeness to the god, as his ørlog is identified with its own. This identification of god and plant is the völva's most memorable achievement of collatio occulta.

There is still one more element of significance in stanza 31. The völva speaks of Baldr as tívorrr, 'a sacrifice', and the manner of his death, as it is described in stanza 32, is indeed that recorded elsewhere of a sacrifice to Óðinn, with the same ironic reversal of expectations, the same transformation of a slender plant into the relentless spear of the god. By the word tívorrr, the poet here touches upon the religious base of the richly elaborated legend of Baldr. Men sacrifice in winter for the renewal of the year and its growth. Now at that same season, when the mistletoe is at its most glorious, Baldr will be sacrificed for the renewal of the world after Ragnarøk. When the new world comes, he will return to it (59). Though killed by an Odinic spear, like the Vanir in their ceaseless war (24), he will come back to life as they did. The völva's vision shows Óðinn what must be done.

(iv) Post mortem

Stanza 32

After the apparition of the sacrificed god and the radiant mistletoe, a subdued declaration of the killing is made. We revert to the vǫlva's narrative, relating, without enigma, though the facts are fabulous, how the thin twig became a murdering javelin, when Hǫðr 'started shooting'—a blind marksman, least likely of killers—and how a new son of Óðinn, specially begotten, grown to manhood in a single night, now 'started slaying'. His body he dedicated to vengeance: 'he neither washed hands nor combed head' until he could carry Hǫðr's corpse to the funeral pyre.

Up to now in the poem there have been many styles, reflecting the variety of the material on which the poet has drawn: there has been realistic narrative—teflðo í túni, / teitir vóro (8)—and fairytale narrative—þaðan koma meylar . . . ór þeim sæ, / er und þolli stendr (20)—and mystic surrealism—á sér hón ausaz . . . af veði Valsþörs (27). But only here, in the vengeance for Baldr, is there symbolic mummary. With lightning speed a new son of Óðinn replaces the old, and immediately on his birth invests himself fanatically with vows like a grown Viking.

Stanza 33

After this vigorous male satisfaction of vengeance comes the weeping of Frigg, the mother. By not stating that she wept 'for Baldr', but for 'Valhǫll's woe', the poet suggests the significance of Baldr's death as the precursor of that of all the gods in Ragnarǫk.

The vǫlva's refrain, 'Do you still seek to know? . . .' catches up this hint of omen and recalls the figure of the vǫlva in preparation for the next vision.

2. Moral prelude: punishments and portents before Ragnarǫk (34–46)

Stanza 34

When the vǫlva had taken Óðinn's bribes, her sight ranged over every world—of verǫld hveria (29). The gods' world—gøðþjóð—had been violent with action and emotion. The world she now gazed on was static and remote as a picture, all action transfixed in a timeless continuum. Her shamanic eyes pursued the painted scenes, punctiliously recording the names of places—of plains, of a river, a beach, a forest, of habitations and their owners—and noting the points of the compass to which she turned to see them—austan . . . fyr norðan . . . sólo fjarri . . . austr. The physical reality this gives to the landscape fits the scenes transfixed in it. Most of these assail the mind with physical pain and revulsion, for it was the foulness of physical punishment that she saw, and the threat of physical monstrosity.

No logical sequence to the succession of scenes and images is marked by the poet, but some associative links between them are strong.

In the world her mind now journeyed in, the first sight that grew clear to the vǫlva's eyes was evoked by the immediately preceding scene in the gods' world, the scene of Frigg weeping. It was Loki the vǫlva saw, and Loki was the one creature who would not weep. The vǫlva's eyes were drawn to the realm of torment by that sin of Loki. He had killed Baldr twice: engineered his slaying by the blind Hǫðr, and then refused to undo the act by weeping him back to life again—as Hel herself would have allowed. In this blatant refusal to repent, Loki plays the part of the incorrigible sinner.

The vǫlva identified him slowly, first by the fettered shape—hapt, then by an intuition of the malignity of it—lægjarns líki Loka, finally by absolute recognition—áþekkian. By this term, áþekkian, the poet draws in the whole story of Loki's refusal to weep. For then, not wishing to be recognized, Loki had disguised himself as a giantess with the name of Þökk (SnE 67–8). But now his guilt had no disguise, and—with a pun on his pseudonym—to the vǫlva he was áþekkian, 'recognizable'.

Loki's repellent torment is not described: we see only the wry distaste of Sigyn his wife, who must catch the serpent's dripping venom in a basin to stop it falling upon him. She 'sits' there, still in the present, like the figure of her on the Gosforth Cross.

Loki's captivity was located underground, in the legendary place of exile and punishment below the roots of the world tree. From his suffering the vǫlva's vision moved to that of human sinners (38), and the landscape she surveyed acquired a more natural topography, familiar to the human eye in its general features, yet made alien in certain details by elaborate fantasy.

The underworld river was murderous with cutting blades, its valleys deathly cold (35). In the north a hall stood on plains—as a hall well might—but it was of gold, and the plains were stretches of interlunar night (36).

The beach she saw was a sunless shore where corpses were washed up, and the hall that stood on it, of homely construction, with door and roof vent, was woven of snakes' backs: through the roof vent their poisonous slaver dripped (37). It is a macabre panorama of an underworld that the vǫlva saw:

at one extreme—of contentment—dwarfs in their darkness lived amid golden abundance, and the beer-brewing giant of the ocean delighted in his banqueting hall on a terrain of perpetual—fermenting—warmth (36). At the other extreme—of misery—human sinners waded endlessly in the floods that bore down against them (38). There was no joy in this realm for human beings—death was their due. The winged serpent of spite (cf. 62) and the outlaw wolf were devouring men's bodies in an ultimate annihilation—sucking or tearing the flesh (the poet is very specific—saug, sleit)

according to their kind. In this place of human damnation, the monotonous and fearful tyranny of poison, of cold, of serpents and hostile waters—mutilating, drowning, belabouring—culminates in the final humiliation of man as food for beasts, a shame so abhorrent that every killer will cover his victim's corpse svá at hvárki æti fuglar né dýr, 'so that neither birds nor beasts may eat it' (Grágás II. 154). Despite these encroaching horrors, I would see in the brief interlude of contentment, with gold and Ægir's beer, in stanza 36, the poet's hermetic statement of future promise (see commentary ad loc.).

Stanza 39 From the ugly scene of death, where monsters are the licensed agents of human punishment, the focus of the vplva's vision moved to a no less ugly scene of birth: a new breeding ground of monsters with a vaster purpose. In a sterile wood an old ogress was giving birth to giant wolves. With sudden insight the vplva announced that one of these will attack the cosmos, wrenching the moon from it, like a thieving troll.

After the savagery of the landscape of torment, the quiet picture of the sedentary 'old one' in the wood seems at first a respite from horror. But that is illusory. Every unnatural detail builds to a climax in which nature itself is crippled: the female breeding in old age, the miscegenation of anthropomorphic being (as we must suppose her to be) and wolf, the immutable black lifelessness of the iron forest where the new life begins, bred to kill the physical world.

Stanza 40 Already the new progeny is sating itself on a wolfish fare of human lives, a rain of blood falling from its ravenous feeding on to the homesteads of the gods, staining them with ill omen. In this dark blood-rain the summers have no glint of sun and the weather is cruel.

Stanza 41 These oppressive portents in the vplva's vision are suddenly replaced by a bright scene: a merry herdsman was sitting, playing a harp; in a tree above him a vivid red cock was crowing. Yet this pastoral peacefulness had an undertow of warning. The harpist's seat was a grave-mound; he himself belonged to the giant world—gýgiar hirðir—and the wood in which the cock was crowing was a hung with corpses. When we hear in the next stanza that two more cocks began to crow, one to wake Óðinn's champions in Valhöll, and one in the halls of Hel to wake the valorous dead, we can be sure that this minstrel's lay is an aubade to war.

Stanza 42 Any minstrel striking his harp to inspire warriors before a battle must appear gláðr—confident, elated at the strenuous prospect of destroying an enemy. But this minstrel exulted with good reason: he knew that this time the giants would be the destroyers. The happy echo of his harp from the grave-mound was rousing them to victory.

Stanza 43 The alert of the cockcrows is followed by the incessant barking of a dog. It is the watchdog chained at the cavernous mouth of the underworld, frantic as it senses that the chase of war is on and that other chains are breaking—festr mun slitna / en freki renna. The vplva, like the dog, is gripped by awareness of the moment. When the wolf breaks his chains, it is Ragnarök. She now sees ahead, beyond the wisdom of the past, to the fate of the gods—adamant and unpalatable: römm.

Distraught at the harshness of what she sees ahead, the vplva borrows Stanza 44 one leaf from the Christian sibyl to warn with homiletic power of the moral evils and earthly wars that are to engulf humanity in its last days, as the world plunges to perdition. Her Christian theme grows easily exuberant with Viking imagery—skildir ro klofnir.

Her trenchant prophecy of moral and physical chaos fulfils the fears of punishment that the visions of the underworld aroused (38 – 40).

While men 'play' with evil and war, Heimdallr's horn rings out to Stanza 45 proclaim the end of the time measured and apportioned to the world—miqtuðr. The tree that is the world sways and moans in decay. Óðinn, a slave of habit, consults his oracle—the embalmed wisdom in Mimir's skull—though there can be little knowledge he needs now.

Already the god-turned-giant, Útgarða-Loki, is breaking from his fetters. The last earthquake his tormented body will ever cause has shaken the tree for the last time.

The dog's bark becomes a refrain of urgency: the wolf is racing to an end Stanza 46 the vplva foresees.

3. Emotional prelude: compassion for the fated gods (47 – 53)

In the last war in the world the modest pantheon of gods is confronted by the vast growth of the giant world, which had been breeding irrepressibly from the beginning of time. This excess of nature in size and number had always troubled the gods, when they thought of the future: they had chained the young wolf (SnE 35) when he began to grow enormous, and Þórr had carried out—in the interests of humanity—a periodic cull of the giant population:

Mikil myndi ætt iþna	Big would be the giant race
ef allir lifði—	if all of them lived—
vætr myndi manna	there would hardly be any men left
undir miðgarði.	in Miðgarðr.

(Hárbarðsljóð 23)

But time now shows that these efforts were in vain.

The giant forces deploy themselves, converging from east and south with Stanza 47 noise and speed and formidable order. Though her narrative is of the future, the vplva tells it in the present tense, a commentary on a pageant already clear and open to her sight.

A giant charioteer heads the surging succession of attackers, formally signalling the start of war with upraised shield. The sea-serpent that ties the earth together (moldþinurr, 57) now discards its function, lashing across the ocean to confront for the last time its primordial enemy, Þórr. Old grudges seek satisfaction, old wives' tales come true. Already there are corpses for the eagle to exult over, and the ship made of dead men's nails is slipping from its moorings—losnar—with an uncanny life of its own. Ragnarøk could not happen—they said—before that ship was ready to ferry the hosts of death. Loki steers them: the route to the gods' realm will be well known to him.

Stanza 48

Stanza 49

And what do the gods feel, as the uproar of the giants' world deafens their ears? What could be troubling them? In the midst of this uproar, as the hydra-headed enemy swarms towards the gods, the poet repeats what was probably an old, popular, ironic question that the giants put to the gods in the numerous tales of their frictions, when the giants knew they had the upper hand and teased the gods with their innocent enquiry (cf. Prymskviða 7). The poet is deliberately recalling the other occasions in the gods' history when they were in consternation because of the giants and the same question might have been asked. But those other occasions ended happily for the gods, and humorously. No other occasion, no other trouble was like this one. Yet, as always, the gods gather in council—ásir ro á þingi—upholding the dignity of custom, while around them all other custom is abandoned in despair. Even the dwarfs come to the doors of hated daylight, forced by one terror to face another—to be turned into stone.

Stanza 50

The last scene in the pageant of attackers unfolds: the last adversary, Surtr, the jet-black fire-giant from the torrid south, comes against the gods brandishing the sword of their own sun, to burn down their world.

Now the rocky hills crack—grióthiþrg gnata—hills that once the great gods had made from a giant's bones (Vafþrúðnismál 21)—and the evicted troll-women trek in search of new lodging. The warrior dead march from Hel, and the sky breaks open.

Stanza 51

Against this sensational scenery the action of the battle itself is epitomized simply in four single combats, told like elegies. The striding out of Óðinn against the wolf and of Freyr against Surtr are two brief instances of action set in the frame of the long sorrow of Frigg. Óðinn's death is her 'second sorrow': first she wept for Baldr, and now the last joy left to her will go, when Óðinn falls—mun Friggjar/falla angan. The overwhelming event is her sorrow, not his death, as the poet tells it. Nowhere else in the extant sources is the relationship of Óðinn and Frigg accorded such tenderness. Nowhere else is grief for Óðinn made equal with grief for Baldr.

Freyr is seen shining—biartr—as he moves to his eclipse, as if he brought all his fair weather with him. Until now he has been the gods' champion—bani Belia—titled with the victory of that archaic contest when he slew with antlers the reigning bull and took the sovereignty. But now his vital sunlight is in Surtr's hands, to become a blaze that brings 'hurt to pliant boughs'—sviga læ—and all the growth Freyr gave to the earth is burned to blackness. Nowhere else is this conventional form of kenning for 'fire'—'the terror of the birch tree'—used with such full significance.

Alacrity of vengeance accompanies Frigg's weeping once again (cf. 32 – Stanza 52 3). Óðinn's son, the silent Víðarr, destroys the adversary his father could not. The care he dedicates to the killing expresses his filial piety better than spoken words.

Pórr's divinity is in his defending strength—miðgarz véorr—and in the passionateness with which he employs it—drepr af móði. These are the two elements of his nature that survive him in his sons, Magni and Móði, in the new world (Vafþrúðnismál 51). But this strength and passion drain from him now. Four words convey the dimension of his failure as he dies—gengr fet nío . . . neppr. His steps are numbered, as he treads each realm of death, and he has barely the strength to take them. Though he leaves the serpent dead behind him—gengr . . . frá naðri—this triumph has no significance now. It cannot save Miðgarðr if he is gone. The last scorn is for the envious sacrilege, the níð, of the snake that killed the sacred guardian with its venom.

D. After Ragnarøk: the ending and renewing of the world (54 – 62)

Swiftly the world acquiesces in its end. Sun, earth, stars surrender their existence. In the earlier days of bad omens, the sunlight was blackened by the bloodstained air (40): now the sun itself turns black. The mountainous earth, whose heights had crumbled (50), now lowers itself wholly beneath the sea's level. The melancholy loss of the brightness of the stars leaves an utter darkness for the final fire to rage in. This fire is not conceived of in terms of light, but as a boisterous growth of vapour and heat, life-destroying, leaping to the limits of the firmament.

The refrain of the barking dog recurs for the last time, drawing us back to the present moment—before Ragnarøk, before the wolf breaks free—and yet reminding us that the völva can see even beyond those terrors—fram sé ek lengra.

Though she herself ('I') can 'see further', the eyes of another 'she' watch 'for a second time' the earth coming out of ocean. Already it is flourishing in an unfailing cycle of green—iðiaagræn—restored to its peaceful and regular nature. The eagle does not now tear at carnage (47), but hovers for the salmon leaping in the mountain falls. It is a magical renewal; there is no longer any need for the labours of creation.

The Æsir are to be found again on Iðavöllr—the plain has renewed itself, as its name foretells—and they talk, reminding themselves of the past world, seemingly with great detachment. There is no suggestion of recrimination or reproach or rejection of that old world.

Stanza 58 The golden pieces from their last golden age (8) will come back into their hands—found in the grass. Here the vǫlva resumes a prophetic tense—þar muno . . . finnaz—and her tone is glowing—undrsamligar / gullnar tǫflor.

Stanza 59 From this good fortune of the finding of the golden pieces there follows a full and confident prediction of a new earthly felicity. Corn will spring up without sowing—like the green leek in the first world (4). All harm will be healed, for Baldr, the Prince, will come. The fortune, the heill, of the world has been restored by his death, and with Hǫðr, the innocent instrument of this good fortune, he builds upon the triumphant foundations that had been Óðinn's:

Stanza 60 Hœnir, priestly god of resurrection—significantly the only one of the old gods to be named beside Baldr and Hǫðr in the new world—now probes the future by sacred lottery. Like a good Norse builder planning a home he uses divination to disclose the most auspicious site. For the sons of the brothers Baldr and Hǫðr (so I understand bræðra tveggja), that site is heaven, the wide wind realm. It is a new location for Norse gods, but one to which the Christian god is well accustomed.

We know of no son of Hǫðr, but to Baldr Snorri attributes a son, Forseti (SnE 33–4). If Forseti is one of the 'sons of two brothers' to whom the poet alludes, then a future of firm peace is here foreseen. For Forseti is the god who 'puts all dissensions to sleep' (Grímnismál 15). His dazzling home—þar Forseti / byggir flestan dag—is called Glitnir, roofed with silver and raised on pillars of gold. It mirrors the moonlit and sunlit heavens that are his destined lot. Like the Christian god, he will administer justice 'from above'.

Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat?

Stanza 61 The vǫlva has a final promise, if her audience seeks to know it. It is a vision that 'she' sees—sér hón—of the future, of a hall rising up, more radiant than the sun, roofed with gold. It is the glorious counterpart, as echoes of phrase emphasize, of that ugly hall of poison, remote from the sun and fabricated out of living snakes, that she saw in the realm of punishment, on the corpse-strewn beach (37).

The radiant hall is sheltered from fire, as its name tells—no flames of perdition shall touch it. In that hall the noble companies of warriors who fought by the side of the gods shall live on in joy.

Stanza 62 The noble are happy and live on. But what of the ignoble? Those who have not deserved life get death, and that is what the vǫlva now sees. The dragon that eats the corpses in the realm of punishment (38) flies up from the lightless landscape to take away from the last battlefield the dead that are its appointed food. Over the plain—vǫllr—where the gods had fought—

Vígríðr heitir vǫllr,	Slaughter-ridden is the field's name
er finnaz vígi at	where they will meet in the fight,
Surtr ok in sváso goð	Surtr and the sweet gods

(Vafþrúðnismál 18)

—it flies off with fodder-laden wings. In the last two stanzas of the poem, the battle of Ragnarök has been given the outline of a moral battle for mankind, borrowed from Christian teaching.

The vǫlva now tells her audience that the séance is over: the spirit has abruptly intimated to her that she now means to descend to her own world.

III. The Texts of Vǫluspá and their Relationship

A. MSS. of the poem used in the present edition

Vǫluspá is the first poem in the Codex Regius (R, c. 1270). With Hávamál it forms an Odinic diptych opening the sequence of mythological poems in the codex.

Two leaves preserved in Hauksbók (in the central section of the bók, AM 544 4^{to}, fols. 20, 21) contain a text of Vǫluspá (H). The hand of these leaves, later than those of Haukr Erlendsson († 1334) and his two scribes, has been variously dated from 'hardly later than 1330' (see Bugge (a), xxii) to mid-fourteenth century,⁵ and may well be that of the scribe of the Codex Wormianus (W, c. 1350 'or a little later', JH II. x). The slight scribal differences between the two texts could (Stefán Karlsson has pointed out to me) arise from the fact that one text may have been written earlier in the scribe's career than the other. The problem is complex in that several other hands have also been identified with that of the Codex Wormianus (see Jakobsen 45–50; Benediktsson 18–19). Nevertheless W has one or two readings that might indicate a connection with H (cf. 9/8, 48/8, 53/11).

In the present edition the numbering of the stanzas of the poem, 1 – 62, follows the order of the text in the Codex Regius. No stanzas found only in the Hauksbók text have been included as part of the text of this edition.

Twenty-eight stanzas from Vǫluspá are cited, wholly or in part, in the text of Gylfaginning in the Snorra Edda (SnE). These citations are preserved, with variants, in the four main MSS. of SnE: Codex Regius (SR, c. 1325); Codex Wormianus (W: see above); Codex Trajectinus (T, c. 1600; this is a copy of a text from the second half of the thirteenth century); Codex Upsaliensis (U, c. 1300; this MS. cites five fewer verses from Vǫluspá than the other three MSS.).

⁵ So Hkb cxxxiii, SN 15. For the dating of Hauksbók itself to the period 1302–10 see Karlsson (a). On the link with the scribe of W see, most recently, Tómasson (b).

The twenty-eight stanzas which, or from which, Snorri cites are: 3, 5, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 19, 25, 26, 28, 37, 38, 39, 40, 44, 45, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 61. Snorri also occasionally gives a prose paraphrase of verses he cites, or of other verses which he has not chosen to cite (e.g. 7, 14, 17, 18, 20, 36, 45, 56, 57, 58, 59). These paraphrases are sometimes very close to the verse text and may corroborate it or offer variants.

At two points in Gylfaginning, Snorri appears to be influenced in his narrative by a version of events that is reflected only in the text of H, (a) in the place of 34/1 R: cf. SnE 69, lines 20, 23, and (b) in the place of 52 R: cf. SnE 71, lines 9–14.

I have not myself consulted any paper MSS. of Vqluspá. I am much indebted to Peter Robinson, who has worked on the collections in which they occur, for checking certain points for me.

B. The history of the text

1. A general foreword

Two interpolations, to which all three sources, R, H, SnE, bear witness (5/5–10 and 10–16) indicate that Vqluspá has not been preserved in its original form without flaw. Apart from these two interpolations, and the consequent loss of original lines (either deliberately discarded by the interpolator, or lost at the time the interpolation was made), R offers a text that is, although often difficult, practically never corrupt or impossible to interpret one way or another. No serious emendations or changes of stanza order are needed. Because R is demonstrably intelligible, it is easier to see what has happened in H.

2. Causes of error in the transmission of the text

The poetic character of Vqluspá is relevant to any attempt to reconstruct the history of its transmission. Both its form and its material scope have led to alterations by copyists:

1. The poem is composed in a sophisticated form, not elsewhere recorded in Germanic, representing an idealized performance of a heathen vqlva. The form reproduces the mediumistic technique of communication with a spirit informant, involving the alternation of personae, of 'I', the performing vqlva, and 'she', the spirit informant, who, in this instance, and perhaps traditionally, is herself a vqlva. The poet, of course, explains nothing, and his artifice may well have proved puzzling in the centuries when Eddic MSS. were being written. Certainly Snorri simplifies the vqlva and her informant to a single figure 'I' in his citations, and a reviser

(perhaps Snorri himself) has removed from the H text the significant contrast of 'she' and 'I' in Refrain III.

2. Together with the tradition of the séance form and its multiple voices, the poet inherited the convention of ambivalent speech and seeming dislocation of thought and tense by which the vqlva—like pythoness or sibyl—challenged the minds of her audience (see, for example, 26, 31). The poet has refined these expressional traditions with a poetic mastery paralleled only in the greatest of the heathen skalds. In a later Christian century both misunderstanding and scholarly impatience with a seemingly disjointed sequence of ideas have provoked attempts to 'normalize' and reorganize the poem: attempts made both by Snorri and the later reviser of the central section of the H text.

3. For the huge scope of his poem the poet had drawn upon a very great number of legends. Few of these he tells in full, but pointedly selects, alludes, adapts. This again is provocation to hearers and readers, who know fuller or preferred versions, to interfere with his text. Such provocation would account for the three interpolations I have signalled in the R text and for most of the additional lines in H.

3. An outline of the history of the text

I offer a simplified reconstruction of the text of Vqluspá in the stages 1. to 7. below. Discussion of the detailed problems involved is given below in section C: Analysis of textual Problems (I–VI).

1. Vqluspá was orally composed ± 1000 , with a structure that is fundamentally that of the R text.
2. A written text, *R I, was made, in which this structure was maintained, ± 1200 .
3. Early in the course of transmission, a version of *R I was made, *R II, which was impaired:
 - (a) by scribal error (e.g. priár, 17/1; omission of nú, 43/1; vel, 59/7). See Problem I;
 - (b) by critical interference, namely by the two interpolations noted in B. 1 above, which affect R, H, and SnE. A third interpolation, following 30/8, cannot be assigned a relative date, as it occurs only in R.

Associated with the two interpolations affecting R, H, and SnE is the loss (i) of the original text of 5/5–8, (ii) of the original stanza(s) between 9 and 17, and, probably, (iii) of the original wording of 9/5, which seems to have been adjusted to fit the interpolated stanza 10. See Problem II.

4. A written text, which I shall call *H I, was derived from *R II. It existed when Snorri was writing Gylfaginning (c. 1225). It was probably made under his direction, to aid his own work.

There is no evidence that *H I did not have the same stanzas, in the same order, as 21 – 43 R (see 7 (a) and (b) below).

The text of the verses from Völuspá cited in Gylfaginning differs significantly in a number of places (in all SnE MSS.) from the text of R and agrees with the text of H.

In several instances where the texts of R and H diverge, the H text has been used by Snorri, in his prose account, without citation of the verse.

In several instances the texts of R and H diverge where there is no parallel text in SnE. These H variants to R could be said to share the thoughtful characteristics of the H, SnE variants to R, rather than the far from thoughtful roughness of the changes attributable to *H II in 7. below. See Problem III (iv).

5. In some of the citations from Völuspá SnE has significant readings that are not found in R or H. These would seem to be Snorri's own considered alterations, rather than variants drawn from another, otherwise unknown, text of the poem, or from oral tradition. See Problem IV.
6. Either before or after it was copied in *H I, the text of *R II was copied with a few significant flaws that can be corrected from H. These textual flaws survive in R. See Problem V.
7. Probably after, and independently of, the composition of Gylfaginning, at a date, or, more probably, dates, not easy to determine, the text of *H I was revised, and also damaged, to form *H II, on which H was based.⁶ See Problem VI. To the *H II text I would attribute the following changes:
 - (a) the rearrangement of five stanza sequences, 21 – 4 R, 25 – 7 R, 37 – 8 R, 39 – 40 R, 41 – 3 R, into a different and, for the most part, haphazard order;
 - (b) the omission of two stanza sequences, 28 – 33 R, 35 – 6 R;
 - (c) the insertion of two additional instances of Refrain III;
 - (d) the insertion of two lines descriptive of end of the world terrors, very loosely fitted to the context, between 44/10 and 44/11;
 - (e) the insertion of four ill-fitting lines, partly corrupt, relating to Ragnarøk, after 45/12 and before 46/1;
 - (f) the insertion of a four-line stanza, of Christian provenance, immediately before the final stanza of the poem;
 - (g) the substitution of two inept lines in place of 7/3–4;
 - (h) the substitution of þussa meyar for ór því liði, 17/2.

⁶ I am not able, within the scope of this edition, to examine the relationship of *H II to H itself. See Problem III (iv) (b).

c. Analysis of textual Problems (I–VI) relating to the history of the text⁸

*Problem I: Scribal error in R II

(i) *Scribal error in R II transmitted to R and H

(a) 17/1. In 17/1 þriár should read þrír, to agree with the subject æsir in 17/4. This must be a scribal error. The scribe who interpolated 10 – 16 (or possibly, of course, a scribe who made a copy of *R I before the interpolation was made) has caught sight of, or remembered, as he wrote 17/1: Unz þrír kvómo, the very similar line 8/5: unz þriár kvómo, and has incorrectly written that. Perhaps by letting his eye be caught by the similarity of 8/5 and 17/1 the scribe lost the original lines preceding 17/1. The relationship between the scribal error þriár, the interpolation 10 – 16, and the loss of lines of the original text preceding 17/1 is very difficult to reconstruct: it seems a build-up of errors. On the H reading þussa meyar, 17/2, see Problem VI (vii).

(b) 43/1. In the first occurrence of Refrain III in R and in H the significant and metrically useful nú (43/1) is omitted, although it occurs in all the other instances of Refrain III in both texts. I have considered this omission an error inherited from *R II.

⁷ For the long oral period this reconstruction is inevitably conjectural, as we have no explicit account of the composition of any Eddic text (though some late 10 c. skalds appear to know some of such texts). The palaeographical evidence of Eddic MSS. does not suggest a date for their exemplars earlier than 1200 (Lindblad 273–6). Earlier evidence of less formal writing down of individual poems is, I imagine, less likely to have survived.

⁸ Here, as elsewhere in the edition, the stanza numbering refers to the text in the present edition. In discussion of variant texts, however, stanzas will be referred to as, e.g. 34 R, 34 H, 52 R, 52 H, 53 SnE (to avoid confusion with the page numbering, SnE 12 etc.).

(c) 59/7. In 59/7 the phrase vel valtiívar is often emended to vé valtiiva, 'sanctuary of gods of the slain', to form a syntactical parallel to Hroptz sigtóptir in the preceding line:

Búa þeir Hǫðr ok Baldr	They inhabit, Hǫðr and Baldr,
Hroptz sigtóptir,	Hroptz's walls of triumph,
vé valtiiva	the sanctuaries of gods of the slain.

The similarity of phrase—byggja vé—in Vafþrúðnismál 51 is persuasive here:

Víðarr ok Váli	Víðarr and Váli
byggja vé goða,	dwelt in the gods' sanctuary,
þá er sloknar Surta logi.	when Surti's fire dies away.

I would suggest a smaller emendation, however, and assume that vel in *R II was a misreading of vés, arising from confusion of long f with l (see commentary to 34/3 lægiarn[s] líki). This would give a syntactical analogy with 49/5–7, where the parallel terms (subjects of the verb) are also separated by a line:

Stynia dvergar	Búa þeir Hǫðr ok Baldr
fyr steindurom,	Hroptz sigtóptir,
veggbergs vísir.	vés valtiívar.

So too in Völuspá 20/10–12, where the parallel terms are in the accusative: Þær líf kuro / alda þornom, / orlog seggia.

For the phrase vés valtiívar, 'gods of the sanctuary', compare Kormakr's term for Sigurðr Jarl, vés vægivaldr:

Hver myni vés við valdi	What man born would contend
vægi kind of bægjask?	against the defending lord of the sanctuary?
	(Sigurðardrápa 6)

(ii) *Scribal error in R II transmitted to R and SnE

In 53/4 the MS. reading úlf for Þórr's opponent cannot be correct. It no doubt springs from the confusion of alliterating phrases Óðinn . . . úlf and Óðins sonr . . . orrn in the sequence of attacks. If Snorri has known the erroneous reading úlf in 53/4 (see Problem III (i) (c)), it must have occurred in *R II.

Problem II: Interpolations

(i) *Two interpolations common to R, H, and SnE, inherited from R II

(a) 5/5–10: the sun, stars, and moon in uncertainty. In the discussion of the sequence of ideas in the poem (Völuspá Introduction n) I have pointed out the factual discrepancies between these lines and those that precede and follow them in the poem. On these grounds I think they must be unoriginal, and that we have lost the poet's second helmingr of stanza 5.

(b) 10–16: the dwarf stanzas. Few critics think the dwarf stanzas an original part of the poem. At least three questions occur to the reader which make him wish to reject them: why should a poet who touches so rapidly on all other myths that concern him, spend seven stanzas on dwarfs? why do we have two versions of the creation of the dwarfs, one in stanza 9 and one in stanza 10? why is there a break in continuity after the last dwarf stanza, before the next episode, the formation of man, which begins in mid-sentence, 'until . . .' and contains a feminine numeral for a masculine noun? In the two other Eddic poems that contain substantial name-lists, Grimnismál and Rígsþula, these lists are of structural importance, well integrated into their poetic setting. This is clearly not the case with the dwarf-names in Völuspá.

Stanza 9 must be retained as part of the original poem, if only to account for the interpolation of 10–16. Without the allusion to the creation of the dwarfs in 9, the interpolation would not have been thought of. Stanza 9 has also a well-planned place in the sequence of ideas in the poem (Völuspá Introduction n) and can be accepted in its own right. It would seem, however, that the interpolation of stanza 10, with the statement that the two master-dwarfs created the other dwarfs 'out of earth' has led to textual trouble in 9/5. In his prose Snorri states that the dwarfs quickened of their own accord like maggots in the flesh of Ymir (that is, I assume, his interpretation of 9/5–8, the plan to create dwarfs out of the sea-blood and rock-limbs of the cosmic giant, namely Ymir). Snorri omits, therefore, 10/1–4, which tells of the creating of the dwarfs by the two master dwarfs, and alters the verse 'they created many man-shaped figures out of earth' to 'many man-shaped figures formed themselves out of earth'. When 9/5 is cited in SnE, it too has to be changed. The gods must not consider 'who' (hverr) should create the dwarfs, as this does not fit their maggot-like origins. Instead, in SR, T, they simply consider 'that' (at in place of hverr) the dwarfs should be created (SnE 20–1).

We may now begin to wonder whether perhaps the reading hverr (R, W, U) has been introduced in *R II by the interpolator in order to anticipate the naming of the dwarf creators in 10 (hverer H might relate to the plurality of the two creators). We might then wish to improve the text, not only by eliminating stanzas 10–16, but by adopting Finnur Jónsson's emendation hvárt for hverr (cf. 23/5), as I have done. The gods deliberate on the usefulness of bringing dwarfs into existence, to take over the tools and the anvils. The answer to their question is clearly 'yes'. From there to the creation of man might be a swift step for so agile a poet, but I cannot guess what way he chose.

(ii) A third interpolation in R

After 30/1–8, describing the cavalcade of valkyries and listing the names of five of them, there follow four summarizing lines in a conventional pula style: 'Now are listed . . . the valkyries' (compare the interpolated lines 12/6–8: 'Now I have counted . . . the dwarfs correctly'). Most editors consider 30/9–12 an interpolation, irrelevant to the context. H and SnE do not have stanza 30 or its context; we cannot, therefore, judge whether or not the interpolation occurred in *R II.

*Problem III: Divergence from R II in H and SnE

Comparison of the three extant texts of stanzas of Völuspá suggests that a copyist directed by Snorri, or possibly Snorri himself, revised *R II in anticipation of the writing of Gylfaginning. This revised text, *H I, was given preference over *R II by Snorri in a majority of instances.

The principal aim of the revision of the text of *R II appears to have been to standardize, to cut out anomaly or irregularity, so that the verse text could be used by Snorri without incongruity in his prose context.

(i) Divergence between R and H, SnE (verse citations)

(a) Standardization of tense in 37–39 in H, SnE. In three stanzas, 37, 38, 39, describing the völva's vision of the otherworld, five verbs are in the past tense in R, but in the present tense in H, SnE:

37/1	R Sal sá hón	H Sal sér hón	SnE 75 Sal veit ek
37/5	R Fello eitrdropar	H, SnE 75 Falla eitrdropar
38/1	R Sá hón þar	H Sér hón þar	SnE 75 Skulu þar
39/1	R Austr sat	H, SnE 19 Austr býr
39/3	R ok fæddi þar	H, SnE 19 ok fæðir þar

It is noticeable, however, that, while H has in 38/1 the present tense sér (cf. skulu SnE), it has the past tenses saug, sleit in 38/7, 9, like R. The time scheme of this stanza in H thus becomes nonsensical. SnE is more consistent: skulu is followed by the present tense kveir in place of saug in 38/7 (38/9 is not cited). Similarly, while H has present tenses býr, fæðir in 39/1, 3, like SnE, it has past tenses (five times) where R has past tenses in 41 and 42 (stanzas stylistically comparable, in the context of the vision, to 39/1–4). SnE does not cite 41 and 42. The half-finished standardization of the present tense in H in the völva's otherworld vision would seem to be linked with Snorri's editing only of lines selected for citation in Gylfaginning.

The interchange of past and present tenses develops dramatically in the 'otherworld' sequence in 34–42, as the action of the poem approaches the threshold of the present (Völuspá Introduction II, stanza 34). Snorri has noted the interplay of tenses; he has deliberately levelled the present tense of 40 into 39 (SnE 19). But he is not regularizing the tenses of the R text just for regularity's sake, he is building up a didactic scenery, in the present, of the world's structure, of heaven and of hell. The first two citations from Völuspá that contribute to this scenery are in the present tense already, 19 and 61. The great ash tree of the world is standing, evergreen . . . The gold-roofed hall is standing, waiting for the valorous dead (SnE 25–6). When Gangleri asks about human life after Ragnarök (SnE 74), he is told that, for the virtuous, there is not only the gold-roofed hall Gimlé, but the two halls described in the völva's vision in 36. The völva saw them in the past, but Snorri describes them in the present—with beer, warmth, and gold, ready to welcome men. So, too, it seems equally fitting to him to present the poisonous hall (SnE 75) waiting for sinners as it looks in the present: the poison drops 'are dripping' from the roof vents. Had not the poet himself led the way in this: the hall 'is woven' of serpents' spines? On Snorri's readings veit ek 37/1, Skulu þar 38/1, see Problem IV (f).

(b) Standardization of stanza sequence in 45–50 in H, SnE. In R the relentless sequence of attack:

Hrymr ekr austan . . .	(47)
Kíóll ferr austan . . .	(48)
Surtr ferr sunnan . . .	(50)

is interrupted just before the climax of Surtr's coming, and the consequent collapse of the rocky world, by a 'stanza of consternation' (49) in which the state of mind of the victims of this attack is glimpsed—

Hvat er með ásom?
Hvat er með álfom?

'What troubles the Æsir? . . .' The ironic, colloquial question comes as an echo of a giant voice from the past (Völuspá Introduction II, stanza 49). Then the giants were premature in their mockery, but now the tables are turned. There is no mistaking the roar from Jötunheimr (49/3). The dwarfs in the stone can tell that the earth's last hour has come (49/5–7). Their fears—in 49—are fulfilled in 50—griðþingr gnata (50/5). The poet has deliberately set the coming of Surtr (50/1–4) within a frame (49/5–7 and 50/5–8) of the collapse of the physical earth and the ending of its hidden life—of the dwarfs and the trollwomen inside the hills and the heroes underground in Hel. (It can hardly be accident that the poet chose the subterraneans to point his intention.) The reason for leaving 49 where it is in R seems good.

H and SnE, however, place 49 immediately after 45. 49 is a 'consternation stanza'. 45 also might well be considered a 'consternation stanza' (with Heimdallr blowing his horn, the world tree shuddering, the 'giant' breaking loose, and Óðinn consulting the prophetic skull). A conscientious reviser might then place the two 'consternation stanzas' together and set the three 'attack stanzas' (47, 48, 50) after them. This is the ordering in SnE. H also places 49 after 45, but follows with 46 (Refrain III, which Snorri always omits), and then 47, 48, 50, as in SnE. It looks as if we see here two stages in Snorri's revision of this stanza sequence.

(c) Deconstruction in H, SnE of the battle sequence 51–53. In the three 'attack stanzas' 47, 48, 50 there is a notable parallelism of sentence structure in the opening lines: subject . . . verb of action . . . adverb of direction. In the three 'defence stanzas' immediately following, 51, 52, 53, there is an equally notable parallelism of phrasing: all three stanzas open with the words Pá kómr.

In 51 the opening phrase is used abstractly: Pá kómr . . . fram, 'Then comes to pass Hlín's second sorrow', and the verb of battle action is placed in a subordinate clause, 'when Óðinn goes—ferr—to fight the wolf'. In 52 and 53 the opening phrase transfers the focus directly to action. In 52 Pá kómr is the stride of silent Víðarr against the wolf, when he coolly sites the thrust of his sword and lives to exult in it. In 53 Pá kómr heralds the last combatant, Þórr, not, like Víðarr, self-controlled, but raging, striking his hammer-blow and dying under his victim's revenge.

In 53 the verbs presenting Þórr's course of action suffice to indicate the rise and fall of his strength. He 'comes' to the arena of battle, he 'goes' against the monster, he 'strikes' in fury. Then a prophetic interjection warns us that he has not saved Miðgarðr from desolation—'all the heroes will leave the homestead of the world'—and he 'goes', dying, away from the enemy he had killed. His fabled hammer-blow is the climax of the stanza, as of his strength, and it comes at the centre of the action (53/5–6).

Neither H nor SnE retains the triple repetition of Pá kómr in 51, 52, 53. Both H and SnE have the same text as 51, and in the same position following 50. In their treatment of 52 and 53, however, H and SnE differ from each other.

In H there follows after 51 a repetition of Refrain III (see Problem VI (iii)). Then, after Refrain III, a stanza follows that is not found elsewhere but which has probably been the source of lines in SnE prose (see Problem III (iii) (b)). The stanza is difficult to decipher in the MS. The menace of the attacking serpent and (?) wolf is described, and there is allusion to the future confrontation of the serpent by 'Óðinn's son, when the wolf has been killed (?)', [and] Víðarr's kinsman (?)'. At least it seems clear that this stanza does not directly narrate either the killing of the wolf by Víðarr (as 52 does), or Þórr's encounter with the snake (as 53 does). The author of these allusions to the fights is interested in stating their future certainty, not—like the author of 52 and 53—in recreating their happening.

In H, after this unique stanza, there follows one that is badly obscured, but which is, as far as one can tell, an eight-line variant of 53 similar to that in SnE. Then follows, in H as in SnE, 54, the dissolution of the cosmos. Thus H offers no version of 52, but for convenience I refer to the unique stanza in its place as 52 H.

SnE, on the other hand, does offer a version of 52, following 51. The last five lines of the stanza are as in 52, but Snorri has replaced the first two lines of 52 by lines 3–4 of 53, making a necessary adjustment in 52/3 to accommodate the change:

52 R	Pá kómr inn mikli møgr Sigfður, Víðarr, vega at valdýri . . .	52 SnE	Gengr Óðins son við úlf vega, Víðarr of veg at valdýri . . .	53 R	Pá kómr inn mæri møgr Hlðýniar, gengr Óðins sonr við úlf vega . . .
------	--	--------	---	------	--

The line við úlf vega has already occurred in all three texts in 51/3–4: er Óðinn ferr / við úlf vega. In 53/4 úlf cannot be correct, and is commonly emended to orm. The error no doubt arises from scribal confusion with 51/4 (see Problem I (ii)).

The altered text of 52/1–2 in SnE has caused a very weak reading in line 3 to avoid repetition of vega: Víðarr of veg (? 'on his way'). Why did Snorri make this change? The copy, or copies, of 52 that he knew may have been defective in the first two lines. Yet his description of Víðarr (SnE 33) as 'almost as strong as Þórr' (hann er sterker næst því sem Þórr)—a statement found in no other source—may well be his own interpretation of the emphasis on Víðarr's great size—inn mikli—in 52/1, and the fact that his superb fight at Ragnarøk comes just before that of Þórr (52, 53).

The adoption of a variant opening for 52 in SnE is probably to be associated not with any defective text of 52, but with the intention evident in H and SnE to simplify and standardize the sequence of actions in the following stanza, 53. Both H and SnE begin their versions of 53 with the verb Gengr. On that account Snorri may have altered the opening of 52 also, to imitate from the R text the initial repetition of action, with Gengr . . . Gengr corresponding to Pá kómr . . . Pá kómr in 52, 53.

It may have struck Snorri as a happy coincidence that the faulty reading úlf in 53/3–4 made those lines a perfect opening for 52, the account of Víðarr's combat. If so, the reading úlf in 53/4 would seem to be a scribal error going back to *R II (see Problem I (ii)).

A comparison of the three texts of 53 provides a wider context for the understanding of the variants of 52. To aid the comparison I have divided 53 into sections (a) to (f) and asterisked the sections in H and SnE where the wording differs from R. The text of H is very difficult, often impossible, to decipher here; I have followed the suggestions of Jón Helgason (JH I. 40–1), though uncertain of his reading frá in (f). See Problem V.

53 R	53 H (reconstructed)	53 SnE
(a) Þá kœmr inn mæri møgr Hlōðynjar,	(e) Gengr fet níu Fiorgyniar burr	*(a) Gengr inn mæri møgr Hlōðynjar
(b) gengr Óðins sonr við úlf [l. orm] vega.	(f) neppr ? frá/af naðri níðs ókvíðnom.	*(f) neppr at [af W] naðri níðs ókvíðnom.
(c) Drepr hann af móði, miðgarz véorr	(d) Munu halir allir heimstøð ryðia,	(d) Munu halir allir heimstøð ryðja,
(d) —muno halir allir heimstøð ryðia—	*(c) er af móði drepr miðgarðs véurr.	*(c) er af móði drepr miðgarðs véurr.
(e) gengr fet níu Fiorgyniar burr
(f) neppr frá naðri níðs ókvíðnom.

1. gengr (b) and (e)

In 53 in both H and SnE the two sentences beginning with gengr have been reduced to one (Snorri having used (b) to open his version of 52).

The author of *H I (irrespective of the scribal error in (b)) was able to omit the statement that Þórr went to fight the snake (I suggest), because he had already included in his text the unique stanza, 52 H, that alludes to this encounter (mun Óðins son / ormi mæta). He therefore follows (e) with (f), as in 53 R.

Snorri has not been able to follow *H I exactly here, because he has preferred to retain 52 R (substantially), rather than adopt 52 H in its stead. To supply the statement of Þórr's attack upon the snake, missing from 53 H, Snorri has very delicately converted the *H I text of (f): (i) by changing the preposition before naðri (whether frá or af) to at, so that Þórr 'goes against', 'attacks' the snake (cf. 51/6: at Surti; 52/4: at valdýri); (ii) by adopting *(a) instead of (e) as the opening of the stanza (fet níu in (e) being relevant only to the dying of Þórr, not to his advance on the snake); and (iii) by taking neppr, 'failing', 'ebbing in strength' to imply that at the very start of the encounter Þórr's inadequacy and imminent failure are apparent (cf. SnE 72: . . . [Þórr] hefir fullt fang at berjaz við Miðgarðsorm; also commentary to Lokasenna 58). Though Snorri must have known that (f), as well as (e), in his source related to the last moments of Þórr (cf. SnE 72: Þórr berr bana orð af Miðgarðsormi ok stígr þaðan níu fet; þá fellr hann dauðr . . .), he seems to have been confident that (f) could be turned to use as a foreboding account of Þórr's first attack by a simple change of preposition.

2. The reversal of (c) and (d)

The narrative significance of the succession of the four finite verbs in 53—kœmr . . . gengr . . . drepr . . . gengr—which I noted at the beginning of Problem III (i) (c), is lost in H and SnE, not only by the omission of two of the verbs (kœmr and one instance of gengr), but by the displacement of the central climax, Þórr's hammer-blow. This is relegated to the end of the stanza, and set in a subordinate clause. To relate (c) to (d), now that the death of Þórr has been told in the preceding (e) and (f), the author of *H I has resorted to a common narrative-prophetic formula that links the happening of two events: some event happens—or will happen—when, or before, or after, some other event happens. The events are commonly grievous, ominous, crucial in some way. The poet of Vqluspá employs this formula tenderly in 51 (Then Frigg's second sorrow will come, when Óðinn encounters the wolf) and with a magnificent touch of drama in 44 (Brothers will fight and kill . . . before the world casts itself away). The text of H offers three further instances of this prophetic formula, all pedestrian and quite lacking in the Vqluspá poet's genius: (i) in the revision of (c) and (d) now under discussion: 'all men will leave the homestead of the world, when the guardian of the earth strikes in wrath'; (ii) after 45/12: 'all men will feel terror on the paths of Hel, before Surtr's kinsman swallows [Óðinn ?]': see Problem VI (iv) (b); (iii) in 52/5–6 H: 'Óðinn's son will encounter the snake, after the death of the wolf . . .': see Problem III (iii) (b).

Snorri is satisfied with the same ordering of (d) and *(c) as in H. I interpret (d) as a timeless maxim—'all men will leave the earth (in death)'—which is given prophetic force by its immediate context, and is intended to be left with syntactical independence, as it stands in 53.

The chief concern of the reviser(s) of 53 has been to try to make of it despite its rare diction a platitudinous piece of information in a regular eight-line stanza, offering two statements: (a) that Þórr dies after killing the snake (H), or is already touched by death as he attacks the snake (SnE); and (b) that his hammer-blow marks the moment when all men will depart from this world in death. The original narrative structure of the stanza has been turned upside down, the end, Þórr's death, being placed at the beginning, and the prophecy of the desertion of the earth being given precedence over the act that strove to prevent it.

(d) Miscellaneous divergences in single words or phrases. There are some instances of minor variants where it does not seem possible to determine which is the preferable reading, e.g. 47/7, neffqlr; H, SnE niðfqlr. I have considered these individually in the commentary.

(ii) Divergence between R and H, SnE (prose)

(a) Standardization of dwelling place: from lake to hall (20/3). In 20/3 the three wise maidens in R emerge 'from the lake'—ór þeim sæ—'that lies under the tree'—er und þolli stendr. In H they emerge 'from the hall'—ór þeim sal—under the tree. That R sæ is not necessarily a scribal error for sal is shown by the little tag-line of Kormakr's in his Sigurðardrápa 4: komsk Urðr ór brunni, 'Urðr emerged from the well'. In the tenth century, it would seem, the most venerable of the three fatal maidens was certainly expected to come out of the water at the foot of the tree, and this is the image the poet of Vqluspá wanted for his three meyjar margs vitandi.

Snorri does not cite the stanza, but gives a close paraphrase of the first lines in prose, linking them with the preceding stanza: þar stendr salr einn fagr undir askinum við brunninn, ok ór þeim sal koma þrjár meyyar. . . ('There stands a fair hall beneath the ash beside the well, and from that hall come three maidens . . .', SnE 23). He sets this paraphrase in a section answering Gangleri's question: 'where do the gods have their chief or holy place?' This place, he is told, is the ash Yggdrasill and the well beside it. Snorri then moves in somewhat headlong fashion (following without sophistication the relevant stanzas in Grímnismál) from the ash as the place of the gods' judgement courts, to its roots and their realms, to Mímir's well, to the rainbow way, Bifröst, by which the Æsir ride to the courts (the names of their steeds are included for good measure), then to the fire burning red over Bifröst, which prevents the hill-giants from invading heaven (himinn). This leads Snorri to the permanently protected places of heaven, among which he places the salr from which the three fate-allocating maidens come.

In writing this passage, did Snorri himself alter sæ in the text of Vqluspá to sal, to simplify his account of the inhabitants of 'heaven', normalizing the three maidens into hall dwellers like so many others in the poem (cf. 33/6, 36/3, 7, 42/8, 61/1), rather than leaving them in a lake-nymph category of their own? I suspect that he did. Snorri knew the tradition that 'Urðr emerged from the well', for he cites in Skáldskaparmál Kormakr's stanza (SnE 152). But he may not have recognized this old tradition in the Vqluspá wording koma . . . ór þeim sæ, which is not, after all, the same as ór brunni. The imperfect identity of sæ with brunni in 19/8 may have seemed to him an obvious sign of error, and he may have suggested the correction to sal in a redaction of Vqluspá being prepared for his use. In the course of his writing he would then cite this redaction as his text.

Alternatively (though I think this very improbable), an earlier copier of a text of *R II (from which *H I then descended) noted the anomaly of sæ following brunni, and introduced the reading sal.

That a scribe of the H text of Vqluspá had extracted the reading sal from Snorri's prose text seems very unlikely.

(b) Standardization of vocabulary (57, 58). In 57/1 the H reading hittaz echoes hittoz in 7/1 (in both R and H), making the establishment of the new world a more systematic parallel to that of the old. In 57/1 R reads, less systematically, but more subtly, finnaz. While finnaz can mean 'meet each other', it can also mean 'are to be found', 'are there for the finding'. Just so will the wondrous gaming pieces 'be there for the finding', and 'be found', in the grass (í grasi finnaz, 58/4). The first earth before its creation was not to be 'met with', or 'found', anywhere in Ginnungagap (í þrð fannz æva . . . 3/5), because it did not exist. Now, in the new world (57/1), the Æsir are to found meeting on Iðavellir: they exist. Hittaz does not have the connotation of 'being in existence', and, indeed, in 7/1, such a connotation would not be relevant. There the Æsir—who had already manifested their presence in parliament—were foregathering in a purposeful meeting—hittoz—to set up their forges of wealth. But in the new world everything happens miraculously of its own accord, and the Æsir find themselves together once more. The reading finnaz in 57/1 is clearly the original, which has been 'corrected' by the author of *H I too zealously.

In 58/1 and 4 the text differs significantly from that of H. Again the author of *H I has preferred a pragmatic statement to a mysterious one:

H Þá munu æsir	R Þar muno eptir
undrsamligar	undrsamligar
gullnar tǫflur	gullnar tǫflur
í grasi finna,	í grasi finnaz,
þærs í árdaga	þærs í árdaga
áttar hqfðu.	áttar hqfðu.

The H text loses the joyous nostalgic backward glance of eptir, linking with the last two lines of the stanza, and the fateful impersonality of finnaz.

Snorri does not cite 57 or 58, but the H text can be discerned in his curt prose summary. The gods setjaz þá allir samt (which is closer to hittaz than to finnaz), and they find the golden pieces in the grass: Þá finna þeir í grasinu gulltǫflur þær, er æsirnir hqfðu átt (SnE 75).

(iii) Two substantial substitutions for the R text in H, which can be associated with SnE

(a) 34/1-4. In 34/1-4 the vplva 'saw' Loki lying fettered under 'Cauldrons Grove'. In 34/5 we are told 'There sits Sigyn . . .'. The lines 34/1-4 are replaced in H by a statement of Váli's binding of (we assume) Loki, but without reference to the location of the deed. When H resumes, therefore, with 34/5, the text offers nowhere for Sigyn to sit. The conjointure is very clumsy. We may note that the H text replacing 34/1-4 is continuing the narrative mode of 33 and its theme of vengeance for Baldr, though 33 is not extant in H.

The interpolated lines in H appear to have a scribal error, as no nominative subject is expressed. This is usually emended:

Dá kná Váli [MS. vala]	Then did Váli
vígbond snúa:	slaughter bonds twist:
heldr vóru harðgiör	made fairly grim
hopt ór þormum.	were those fetters of guts.

Váli is well known in Eddic tradition as son of Óðinn, avenger of Baldr, killer of Höðr, survivor, with Víðarr, in the new world after Ragnarök. Nowhere, except in H, is he said to have placed the bonds upon Loki, but, as he was begotten expressly to avenge Baldr, it is logical enough that the binding of Loki should be attributed to him.

The author of *H I has taken these lines from traditions (written or oral) external to Vqluspá; indeed, they seem to represent the kind of traditions that the poet himself has been careful to avoid. Snorri, on the other hand, has found the lines interesting. Out of them he has invented a new son for Loki, Váli Lokason. He appears to have interpreted the H text Vála vígbond as 'bonds from Váli's act of slaughter', since he relates that Váli Lokason was changed into a wolf by the Æsir and straightway tore apart his brother Narfi. The Æsir used Narfi's intestines as bonds for Loki (SnE 69). The story is found in a variant form in the prose epilogue to Lokasenna, but without reference to Váli.

The prominence of Hapt at the opening of 34 R could perhaps have recalled the 'fettering' lines—cf. hopt ór þormum—to the author of *H I, and prompted his variant text.

(b) 52. In place of 52, describing Víðarr killing the wolf, H has a unique eight-line stanza (52 H; see Problem III (i) (c)). Its only point of similarity with 52 is the occurrence of the name Víðarr:

Ginn lopt yfir	Across the sky gapes
lindi iarðar,	the girdle of earth,
gapa ýgs kiptar	the jaws of the fearful wolf [MS. serpent]
úlfs [MS. orms] í
hæðum	yawn in the heights.
Mun Óðins son	Óðinn's son will
ormi mæta,	encounter the serpent,
vargs at dauða	after the death of the wolf
[ok] Víðars niðia.	[and] Víðarr's kinsman (i.e. Óðinn).

Since kiaptar is used of the wolf (cf. Vafþrúðnismál 53), but never of the serpent, I have emended orms (by no means clear in the MS.) to úlfs (cf. the reverse confusion of úlf for orm in 53/4). As the stanza summarizes by allusion actions that are narrated in 52 (in R and SnE) and 53 (in R, H, and SnE), it is clearly extraneous to the poem, but Snorri seems to have used it for his prose picture of the advance of wolf and serpent side by side, SnE 71: Fenrisúlfr ferr með gapanda munn, ok er hinn neðri kjöptr við jörðu, en hinn efri við himin: gapa myndi hann meira, ef rúm væri til. Here the words gapa, kjöptr, við himin, though in context conventional, have their parallels in the verse. Miðgarðsormr — er hann á apra hlið úlfnum—does not, in SnE, gape in rivalry with the wolf. Snorri has rather been inspired by Ginn lopt yfir/lindi iarðar to develop his image of the serpent bespattering air and ocean—dreifir lopt öll ok lög—with its poison. Did it not seem probable that Snorri knew this stanza, we might have more readily attributed it to *H II.

(iv) Divergence between R and H where there is no SnE parallel text (other than instances considered under Problems V and VI)

Occasionally H differs significantly from R in a manner similar to that of the most notable H, SnE variants, where the principal aim is standardization. I select three variants for consideration here.

(a) 20/9-12. In 20/9-12 the sequence of ideas in the R text is lost in the H text. In R—

Þær lög lögðo,	They laid down laws,
þær lif kuro	they chose out lives
alda börnom,	for mankind's children,
ørlog seggia	men's destinies

—lif and ørlog are syntactically parallel: when the wise maidens choose life for men they choose also their fate. The delicate development from 'life' to 'fate' indicates the ultimate identity of the two concepts (a theme sounded in the two preceding stanzas). Instead of ørlog seggia H reads ørlog at segia: the maidens 'chose lives for mankind's children, to declare their fates'. The logic of the new reading can hardly have seemed perfect even to its author, but the conventional association of the verb segja with orlög (cf. Lokasenna 25, 29) was evidently strong enough to make him alter the phrasing of R.

(b) 22/5–6. In 22/5–6 the poet plays on the word seið (a) as accusative of seiðr, ‘sorcery’, and (b) as preterite of síða, ‘to practise sorcery’. This grammatical pun enables him to link Heiðr’s knowledge with her practice in a minimum of words, achieving a brisk contrast between the weight of her knowledge—seið hón kunni—and the instability of her mind in performance—leikin.

In H the grammatical pun has been removed. Seið is now standardized as the preterite verb in both instances, through the introduction in 22/5 of phrasing suggested by 22/2: seið hón hvars hón kunni, ‘she practised sorcery wherever she could’. This foolish change destroys the image of Heiðr’s unhindered power, that previously dominated the stanza.

To be associated with this alteration of the R text, is, I think, the reading hugleikin in H for leikin, 22/6. A revising copyist may have thought leikin obscure (but see commentary) and attempted to define the term more precisely by attaching hug-, presumably intending ‘mentally possessed, entranced’. This would seem to be his own coinage, since elsewhere hugleikinn is recorded only in impersonal usage: ‘pleasing to the mind’. Heiðr could be practising her magic ‘to her heart’s content’, but I find no parallel for this syntax.

I have considered these variants in 22/5–6 H as occurring possibly during the making of *H I, but they might well have been introduced later, i.e. during the making of *H II, when, no doubt, the desire to standardize was still strong. It may be significant that *hón*² in 22/5 H is the only instance of the spelling ‘hun/hvn’ in H: a form not found in Icelandic records before the beginning of the fourteenth century. Also notable is the fact that in the same line the h of hvars has been corrected from k, which suggests that the scribe of H either had the text of R (which could also be that of *H I) before him, or at least knew it, and had begun to write kunni.

(c) 43/5–6. Refrain III (43) is only written in full in its first occurrence in both R and H. In this full version lines 5–6 differ in the two texts:

R	Fiðlð veit hón fræða,	H	Fram sé ek lengra,
	fram sé ek lengra . . .		fiðlð kann ek segja . . .

The H text exhibits here the same simplification of the two völur personae that characterizes Snorri’s citations from Völuspá (see Problem IV (f)). It is not found elsewhere in H. As Snorri does not cite Refrain III, however—though he evidently knew at least the opening of it—we have no means of dating the formation of the H variant of Refrain III. It could have occurred first in *H II, but I am inclined to think it a revision designed by Snorri, which he never used.

Problem IV: Snorri’s variants, not shared by R, H

A few readings in stanzas cited by Snorri are not in R or H:

(a) 3/2. In 3/2 Snorri has ekki var (SnE 11, all MSS.), as against R, H Ymir byggði. Snorri might have known a now lost Old Norse poem about the primordial void in which the line þar/þat er ekki var occurred—cf. Wessobrunn Prayer 6: Do dar niuuht ni uuas—or he might have invented it himself; but it is unlikely that it occurred in the poet’s text of Völuspá (Völuspá Introduction 11, stanza 3). We may note that Snorri cites this stanza when he is describing the cosmos before Ymir was formed in it (SnE 12). If Ymir’s name stood here in the text Snorri was using, he would have to remove it, as he had not yet mentioned Ymir in his prose. I suppose that is what he did.

The progressive standardization of the language in the SnE texts of stanza 3 is remarkable. SR and T have ekki not only in line 2, but also in line 5 (with U; cf. R, H, W æva) and in line 8 (with W, H; cf. R, U hvergi).

(b) 5/5–10. In 5/5–10 (*R II interpolation) Snorri has changed the order ‘sun . . . stars . . . moon’ to ‘sun . . . moon . . . stars’, i.e. to a more conventional ranking of these heavenly bodies (SnE 15).

(c) 9/5, 10/5–7. In 9/5 I would attribute to Snorri the reading at (SR, T) and the revisions in 10/5–7 (SR, T, W). These are discussed in the context of the interpolation 10 – 16 (Problem II (i) (b)).

(d) 19/1, 3. In 19/1, 3 Snorri (SnE 24–5) ties the poetic text more closely to his description of the holy water that laves the world tree, introducing the concept of holiness here for the world tree itself from a later stanza (27/4), which he does not cite:

R, H	Ask veit ek standa,	SnE	Ask veit ek ausinn [standa U],
	heitir Yggdrasill,		heitir Yggdrasill,
	hár baðmr, ausinn		hár baðmr heilagr,
	hvítaauri.		hvítaauri.

The revision is neat, with the skaldic-style link between the first and fourth lines: ‘I know an ash tree, drenched—Yggdrasill it is called, high, holy tree—with shining white loam’. No doubt Snorri’s juxtaposition of heilagr and hvítaauri is intended to emphasize the religious overtones of hvíta- for Christian readers and to suggest the laving of the tree, with vatn heilagt and hvítaaurr, as an image of heathen 'baptism' that prefigured the Christian. The laving by the norms, to save the tree's life, would seem to be a contribution of Snorri's to explain the term ausinn in context. The laving is found in no other source. Snorri adds that all things that enter that well become as white as the membrane within an eggshell (cf. Psalm 50: 9: Domine... lavabis me, et super nivem dealbabor).

(e) 26/1. In 26 (SnE 47) the two helmingar are reversed in SR, T, U (W omits 26/5–8). In 26/1 (now line 5 in SnE) SR reads Pórr einn þat vann, where þat has as antecedent—through the reversal of the helmingar—the ominous oath-breaking elaborated in 26/5–8: 'Pórr alone achieved that'. In his prose Snorri follows the order of his revised verse, noting the gods' decision not to respect their oaths to the giant before he describes Pórr's triumphant hammer-blow. He has defused the tragic implications of the oath-breaking coming in the verse after Pórr's 'triumph' by placing it before, so that the happy ending of his own story is not disturbed. I suggest that, having made this decision, Snorri sought to provide a grammatical connection between the two helmingar, with a connective þat and an unobtrusive verb, vann, 'effected', 'did'.

(f) 37/1, 38/1, 61/1. In 37/1 (SnE 75) Snorri reads Sal veit ek standa in place of Sal sá (sér H) hón standa, and in 38/1 he reads Skulu þar vaða in place of Sá (sér H) hón þar vaða. In 61/1 (SnE 26) Snorri also reads Sal veit ek standa instead of Sal sér hón standa (R and H). He has precedents for his choice of phrasing in 19/1: Ask veit ek standa and 61/5–6: Þar skolo dyggvar / dróttir byggja, which would help him to remove the second vplva figure, hón, from the text. The change to present tenses in 37/1 H, 38/1 H, with retention of hón, suggests that Snorri first contemplated keeping the vision framework with hón, setting it in the present tense (cf. his reference to the vplva before the citation of the dwarf þula: Ok þessi segir hón nqfn þeira, SnE 21), but subsequently decided that it gave unnecessary complexity to his own didactic structure. In effect, he has standardized the supernatural knowledge ('I know') of the vplva, and never referred to her visionary powers ('she sees/saw'). He has cleverly used the prophetic parallel of 61/5 (Þar skolo...) to avoid the visionary reference, Sá hón, in 38/1, so providing a closer comparison, verbally, for the fates of the good and the evil: Skulu þar vaða... menn meinsvarar. Snorri's levelling of phrasing through these citations resembles the standardization of vocabulary in 57, 58 in H (see Problem III (ii) (b)).

(g) 38/7. In 38/7 (SnE 75) Snorri reads kvelr, 'torments', for R, H saug, 'sucked'. To suck corpses is natural to a snake; to torment corpses is not possible, unless of course they are still alive in hell. This is no doubt Snorri's meaning. He has wished to strengthen the Christian associations of the otherworld scene. On the present tense see Problem III (i) (a).

(h) 53/11. In 53/11 (SnE 74) Snorri reads at naðri (SR). On the interlocking revisions of this stanza in H and SnE see Problem III (i) (c).

(j) 61/3. In 61/3 instead of gulli þakðan SR and T read gulli betra. As Snorri extols this hall of the virtuous dead as one that skal standa, þá er bæði himinn ok jörð hefir fariz (SnE 26), it is conceivable that he preferred, for his context, the moralizing comparison, 'better than (deluding) gold', to the heathen extravagance of a golden roof. The parallelism in 'fairer than the sun', 'better than gold', may have attracted him: a variant, no doubt, of his own devising.

Problem V: Textual flaws in R that are not in H

I divide these flaws into two categories: those about which I feel as certain as one can be, and those about which I do not.

(i) Scribal slips in R

(a) Omissions: 1/2, 57/5–6. Two small omissions are of importance to the poem: 1/2, helgar, and 57/5–6, ok minnaz þar / á megindóma. There can be little doubt that H in both instances preserves the text of the original poem. Snorri's curt synopsis of 57/5–8 would seem to support the wording of H here: minnaz á rúnar sínar (SnE 75).

(b) Other copying errors: 25/5, 26/1, 40/5, 45/9–12, 38/4. Five errors in the copying of words or line order:

1. 25/5: 'hv^{er}ir'; H hverr. H is correct here, since the singular anticipates the expected answer: Loki. All SnE MSS. read hverr (SnE 47).
2. 26/1: 'v^{ar}'; H, T, U, W vá, SR vann (SnE 47). See Problem IV (e).
3. 40/5: 'svart v^{ar} þa'; H svört verða. H is correct here: the future-present tenses in this stanza (fylliz, rjóðr, verða) are a continuation of the future-present in the preceding stanza where verðr 39/5 marks a conspicuous shift from the past tenses sat, fæddi 39/1, 3 (see Problem III (i) (a)). All SnE MSS. read svört verða (SnE 19). The error in R could also be associated with an assumption on the part of the copyist that sólskin was singular.

4. 45/9–12: this correct line order is in H, SnE. In R lines 9–10 follow 11–12 (which are twice written). A similar error in line order in R has been corrected by the scribe in 38/3–4. In H the four lines interpolated after the climax line 45/12 have no structural connection with the preceding stanza. See Problem VI (iv) (b).

5. In 38/4 R reads morðvargar instead of acc. morðvarga, as H, after Sá hón. The error in R might derive from some remembered reading of the SnE text: Skulu . . . morðvargar, but, as 38/3–4 were first miswritten menn morð vargar meins vara ok, and later corrected by the scribe himself, the ambiguous form menn may have caused the nom. pl. vargar without influence from SnE. See MS R corrections 17.

(ii) Less certain scribal slips in R

(a) 26/8: 'foru' R, 'voru' H, 'fóru' SR, U, 'voru' T (26/5–8 omitted in W). I have adopted the H reading in the present text.

(b) 41/6: gaglvíði R, galgvíði H (41 is not cited in SnE). I have adopted the H reading in the present text (although it is the 'easier' reading). See commentary.

(c) 53/11: neppr frá R, neppr af W, nepr at SR, neprar T. H is today quite illegible at this point. Jón Helgason (l. 46) thought he could 'glimpse parts of words and letters' among which were nepr fra, but he could not be wholly sure of these. He was using an ultraviolet lamp on the text of H for the first time. His tentative transcription raises some doubts, however. He prints fra in full: the two other instances of frá in H are abbreviated 'f^{ra}'. In R frá is twice abbreviated 'f^{ra}' (53/11, 62/4), once written in full (14/6). MS. forms of af (where the two letters are joined as one) and frá (where the abbreviation for ra stands immediately above f) might easily be confused by a scribe, or a reader of a partially obliterated text. I think it possible that R frá is an error for af, but I am not sufficiently confident to adopt af in the text without better evidence from H (although W, possibly the scribe of H, reads af; see commentary to 53/11).

If it could be determined that H read frá in 53/11 we could (a) accept frá as the original, although less idiomatic reading; or (b) consider R, H frá as an error in *R II which has been 'corrected' to the more idiomatic af in W and deliberately changed to at in SR, for new contextual reasons; or (c) consider R, H frá as an error in a copy of *R II not used by Snorri, whose copy of *R II read af.

Problem VI: The further development of the H text: changes not directly attributable to Snorri

(i) Rearrangement of the stanza order 21–43, causing accidental omission of 28–33

The distinctive feature of the H text is the attempt to reorganize the central section of the poem. I shall call the author of this attempt 'the reviser'.

I have traced a sequence of ideas in 21–43 (Vqluspá Introduction II), with which the text of H, as far as it goes, can be compared. I say 'as far as it goes', because H lacks the climax of this section of the poem, the vision of Baldr's death and the killing of Hqðr (28–33). The omission of the death of Baldr leaves lines in H without context: the punishment of Loki (34), for example, and the return of Hqðr and Baldr (59). The omission of Baldr's death cannot have been an intentional characteristic of any well established oral version of the poem, and it is difficult, indeed, to imagine the omission occurring even in a casual oral recitation. It might easily have arisen, however, by a 'clerical error' in a scriptorium. In order to rearrange these twenty-three stanzas (or prepare selections for recitation) a reviser might have copied the distinct stanza sequences on separate schedulae. The schedula containing 28–33 might have been overlooked, or missing (see Problem VI (ii) (a)), when *H II was being created. The most that we can do in these circumstances is to consider what we think is lost, or what gained, by the changes apparent in H, when compared with R. The author of *H II may have been in the unenviable position of having to reconstruct a text of the poem from no more than its beginning and end sequences and a box of unnumbered and incomplete slips for its centre.

(a) 20 H, 25–27 H. In R it is clear that 20 closes one section of the poem and 21 begins another. In 21 there is the striking return to the figure of the vqlva, but with a change of persona, hón—'she remembers'—occurring for the first time. There is also the sense of a new start, conveyed by the phrase fyrst í heimi—'the first pitched battle in the world . . .'.

The poet's signalling of this new phase of his poem has not been recognized in H. H does not follow 20 with 21–4 (the Æsir–Vanir war), but with 25–6 (the tale of the giant builder). The repetition after 20 of the familiar Refrain I (in 25) effectively destroys any sense of a 'new start'.

The placing of sequence 25–6 before 21–4 is also unfortunate, since the gods' fear of losing Freyja (25/7–8) chronologically follows the account of the Æsir–Vanir war: Freyja did not belong to the pantheon before that war happened. And it would be when their wooden wall was shattered in the war (24/5–6), that the gods would need the new stone wall the giant builder offered. The chronological ordering of events is emphatically observed in the first and third sections of the poem, where R and H do not greatly differ. In R an equally clear chronological ordering is observed also in the central section (21 – 43).

In 27 the vplva 'knows' and 'sees' the gods' apprehension of their end. In R this is a finely placed bridge stanza between the ominous oath-breaking (26) and the visit of Óðinn to the vplva to learn of Baldr's fate (28 – 33). The first occurrence of Refrain II—Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat?—at the close of 27 subtly introduces an allusion to the séance technique of question and answer immediately before the approach of Óðinn, who is coming with his questions (cf. Hvers fregnið mik? 28/5). As H does not have the sequence of Óðinn's visit, the image of the all-knowing, all-seeing vplva in 27 loses in H its specific contextual significance. There is no evidence that the reviser intended to place 28 – 33 in his H text after 27 (see discussion of 34 H below); there is no evidence, therefore, that he was aware of the poet's own well-constructed sequence.

(b) 39 – 40 H. After 25 – 7 the reviser has placed 39 – 40. In R these stanzas come within the framework of the vplva's otherworld vision. 39 and 40, however, are not explicitly visionary stanzas, dependent on the framework, but prophetic: they prophesy the birth of the monstrous wolf, who 'in troll's skin' will seize the moon (39/5–8). The reviser may well have seen a thematic connection here with the attempt of the giant builder to carry off the sun and moon (alluded to in the wording of 25/5–6). On that account he may have juxtaposed the two sequences. So, the vplva's cry—'Do you still seek to know . . .?'—at the end of 27, is followed suitably enough by the appalling prophecy in 39 – 40, and the link between the two sequences confirmed by the repetition of her cry at the end of 40.

(c) 21 – 24 H. The sequence of the Æsir–Vanir war, 21 – 4, now follows 39 – 40 in H. There is no logical or thematic link between these two sequences, but the reviser might possibly have intended a moral one, to continue his theme of foreboding with renewed moral emphasis. War is, like the oath-breaking of 26/5–8, a reprehensible thing, especially among those who claim to be gods, and especially if it results in union with the degenerate Vanir and their 'ill Vanabrúðr'—or so a Christian reviser, like many later scholars, might think. But the tone of the verse in the Æsir–Vanir sequence is buoyant and witty—as befits its propitious outcome—and quite unlike the oppressive, menacing tone of the preceding stanzas 39 – 40 in H. This juxtaposition has little to recommend it.

(d) 34 H. After the Æsir–Vanir war sequence there follows 34. In the variant H text of lines 1–4 Váli does his brutal fettering; his victim, Loki, is not named. The emergence of 34 in the text of H is only understandable if 32 – 3, or a variant equivalent, had preceded it, at least in the reviser's mind. It cannot have been the considered intention of the reviser to place the binding of Loki immediately after the Æsir–Vanir war, with which Loki has no connection in any source. If the reviser had intended to place the whole sequence 28 – 33 immediately after the Æsir–Vanir war sequence (21 – 4), there are certain general parallels in subject-matter that might have prompted him to do so: Óðinn and a vplva appear notably in both sequences, and shield-bearing valkyries (30) relate to the theme of war. These are, however, such poor reasons poetically for placing the two sequences together, that one hesitates to mention them.

Nevertheless, an intended order of 21 – 4, 28 – 33, 34 in *H II is conceivable.

(e) 43 H, 41 – 42 H. After 34 the reviser has placed the first occurrence in H of Refrain III, a variant version of 43. He may have done so in order to juxtapose menacingly the binding of Loki (34/1–4 H) and the prophecy of bonds breaking at Ragnarök—festr mun slitna (43/3). If he had then decided to omit (as he does) 35 and 36, regarding them perhaps as misplaced and morally valueless scenes of otherworld geography, he may have introduced Refrain III to provide continuity in their place. Unfortunately, by doing so he has destroyed the poet's design, by which 41 and 42 lead up to and prepare for 43, the first dramatic occurrence of Refrain III, moving from the sights and sounds of the past to the last warning of the cock's crow and dog's bark in the terrifying present. In H, however, these two anticipatory stanzas are made to follow the first occurrence of the Refrain, not to lead up to it.

(f) 37 – 38 H, 43 – 44 H. After 42 the reviser turns back to plunder the stanzas of the vplva's otherworld vision, selecting 37 and 38 to follow 42. He may have seen a possible link between the 'halls of Hel' in 42/8 and 'hall remote from the sun' in 37/1–2, but above all he may have wished to bring the scenes of human sinners and their punishments after death (37, 38) closer to the scenes of living human evil in 44. This is in fact what he does (first interposing a second instance of Refrain III to smooth the transition).

In H the sequence of stanzas after 20 has now become: 25, 26, 27, 39, 40, 21, 22, 23, 24, 34, 43, 41, 42, 37, 38, 43, 44. After 44 the text of H follows the stanza order of R, with variations noted in Problem III (i) (b) and (c) and some insertions of additional lines noted in Problem VI.

(ii) Omission of two stanza sequences

(a) 28 – 33. I have attributed this omission to 'clerical error' (see Problem VI (i)). Among the sequences in this section of the poem 28 – 33 is unique, not only in length, but in forming a complete scene, much as Baldrs Draumar does. It could have been set aside for use independent of Vqluspá.

(b) 35 – 36. 35 may have been dropped from the text because it is not explicitly relevant to anything retained in H. In R the picture of the savage river Slíðr follows a reference to Hveralundr (34/2), i.e. to its source (see commentary); but that reference has been cut from the H text. 36 has no relevance whatever to the minatory text of H, and has no doubt been rejected on that account.

(iii) Insertion of two additional instances of Refrain III

Refrain III occurs three times in R (43, 46, 55), five times in H. The occurrences in H are:

1. after 34 and before 41 (34 H, 43 H full version, 41)
2. after 38 and before 44 (38, 43 H abbreviated, 44)
3. after 49 and before 47 (49, 46 H abbreviated, 47)
4. after 51 and before 52 H (51, 46 H abbreviated, 52)
5. after 54 and before 56 (54, 55 H abbreviated, 56)

In H only in 1. and 4. is there no connection with a following R stanza. In 5. the regular R sequence is already being followed in H. It is noticeable that 1. and 4. introduce Refrain III where there has been a substantial alteration to the text of R. This may suggest that the reviser wished to strengthen the impression of unity at the places where he felt it was weakest.

(iv) Two insertions of popular portentous verse in the context of Ragnarøk

(a) After 44/10 H reads:

grundir gialla,	the lands shriek,
gifr fljúgandi	trollwomen [are] flying

As the lines do not fit the syntax of the preceding stanza, they are no doubt a reminiscence from some other source, which the interpolator thought fitted the context of the collapse of the world—verpld steypiz (44/10). I have suggested that the lines are ‘popular’ because they are rough and reflect the terrors of popular tradition. It may have been the currency of just such popular traditions in his day that made it natural for the poet to allude to the roar of the giants’ realm (49/3) and the disturbed trollwomen—gifr rata (50/6)—in his own more sophisticated poem. I have not found parallels, as yet, to the phrasing of these two lines.

(b) After 45/12 H reads:

hræðaz allir	all men will be panic-stricken
á helvegum,	on the paths of Hel,
áðr Surtar þann	before Surtr’s kinsman
sefi of gleypir	swallows that one [?]

The text is evidently corrupt. Two lines could have been lost after Surtar. The only one swallowed at Ragnarøk is Óðinn; this would make ‘Surtr’s kinsman’ the wolf. Such a relationship is nowhere else mentioned. Surtr could here, as elsewhere (see LP s.v.), be a general term for ‘giant’, who would then be Loki, father of the wolf. This unsatisfactory argument does not mend the text. But it seems possible to accept these lines as another example of the ‘formula of popular prophecy’ in H, comparable to 52/5–6 H and 53/5–8 H (see Problem III (i) (c)). The clumsiness of this insertion is underlined by the fact that the tradition that Óðinn was swallowed by the wolf (Vafþrúðnismál 53) is one discarded by the poet (51).

(v) Insertion of a Christian stanza between 61 and 62

61 offers an image of the gold-roofed hall where the virtuous companies of men will live for ever in joy. 62 offers a scene of the removal of the dead to the underworld to be dragon’s food. Judgement of some kind is implied, but not stated. In H a four-line stanza has been inserted between these two stanzas to provide an explicit reference to Judgement:

Pá kemr hinn ríki	Then comes the Sovereign at regindómi,	to divine Judgement/Empire,
öflugr, ofan,	full of power, from above—
sá er öllu ræðr.	he who governs all things.

It is possible that regindómi has no reference to Judgement, but means only ‘divine authority, jurisdiction’, on the analogy of konungdómr. Regindómr is recorded nowhere else, but the analogy of til reginþinga, ‘to the supreme assemblies’, in Helgakviða Hundingsbana I 51 (SG) supports a concrete interpretation for -dómr as ‘court of judgement’: the judicial place to which the All Powerful ‘comes’ (kemr at). I do not think that the suggestion is well founded that hinn ríki is Heimdallr, and that therefore the stanza is part of the original text of Vqluspá (see commentary to 62 H).

(vi) Two inept lines substituted for 7/3–4

This is the only instance in stanzas common to both texts, where H has wording totally different from R. The Æsir have met to fabricate wealth; the poet mentions that they have already built their temples: ‘those (Æsir)’, er horg ok hof / hátimbroðo. Instead of this allusion to their artisan achievements, H reads afls kostuðu, / allz freistuðu, ‘they exerted their strength, they tried everything', as if, indeed, the Æsir were finding themselves in difficulties. The scribe responsible for this substitution may have had a bad text. His substitute reading may have been called into his mind from some (humorous, unidentified) source by the word afla in 7/5.

(vii) Substitution of þussa meyar for 17/2

It would seem that the writer of *H II has introduced a feminine plural from 8/6, þussa meyar, into 17/2, to agree with þriár in 17/1. So he superficially tidies up the first two lines of the stanza grammatically, discarding 17/2, ór því liði, which probably meant as little to him as it does to us.

D. MS. R corrections⁹

The writing in the text of Vqluspá in R appears to have been corrected in twenty-seven places. I set out below all the instances of correction. The majority are clearly those of the original scribe (marked *); a few seem to be those of a later hand (marked ). Assigned to the later hand are (a) erasures which delete what the original hand had already deleted by subscript dots (e.g. (4), (7) below); (b) erasures of error apparently not noted by the original scribe (e.g. (21), (26) below); (c) erasures that introduce error into the text (e.g. (2) (b), (11), (18) below; see FJ Facs lxix).

In one instance, it would seem, the original scribe has introduced an error by his 'correction' (25).

1. * 2/3 þá corrected from 'þæ' by subscript dot (note 'þæ', 1/8, in the line immediately above).
2. 2/6 'ivipi^{ur}'
* (a) the original scribe has begun to write an erroneous tall letter instead of v (or possibly a superscript r, cf. 'vi'pi', fol. 7, line 2), and then corrected clearly to v.
 (b) a later hand has scraped away the superscript abbreviation for ur, but it can still be traced by ultraviolet light (Karlsson and Tómasson 227–8). Compare the superscript abbreviations for ur in 'sigfæð^{ur}' and 'fæð^{ur}' fol. 4, lines 15, 17. This abbreviation is rarely used elsewhere in R for the fem. pl. ending regularly written as 'or' (CT).
3. * 3/7 ginnunga: i corrected from r (probably an anticipation of gras, 3/8).
4. 4/6 á salar steina

⁹ FJ Facs 94–101 gives a detailed description of all the corrections and peculiarities of the text of Vsp in R. The ultraviolet photograph of the MS. made by Arne Mann Nielsen for the Arnamagnæan Institute, Copenhagen, clarifies the text even further.

- * (a) corrected from af salar steini (cf. 14/6) by the original scribe, who deleted f by subscript dot and wrote a over -i.
-  (b) a later hand has erased f.
5. * 7/5 afla: af corrected from 'æ' (probably an anticipation of 'æð', that opens the next verse-line).
6. * 12/1 ok (ampersand) written twice ('7|7'); *ok*¹ deleted by subscript dots.
7. 12/4 Vitr ok Litr
* (a) Vitr ok Litr at the end of a line are followed at the beginning of the next line by ok (ampersand) Vitr, which has been deleted by the original scribe by subscript dots. Four MSS. have the order Litr ok Vitr.
 (b) a later hand has erased ok Vitr.
8. * 14/6 frá salar steini corrected from Aurvanga siqt til (an anticipation of 14/7) by the original scribe (see FJ Facs 97 for full analysis of this correction).
9. * 19/3 'hárbaðmr' corrected from 'hárbarmr' (cf. BDr 9/1–2: hávan hróðrbarm, 'tall tree of fame'; Grím 40/5: baðmr written baðmr).
10. * 20/1 Paðan: ð written over t (or possibly r).
11.  21/3 'gull ueigo': a later hand has erased -o. Cf. H text.
12. * 22/8 brúðar corrected from þiððar ('brv' written over 'þio').
13. * 28/8 'þit' (following auga falt) is deleted by subscript dots.
14. * 32/2 sýndiz: d inserted above the line, with omission stroke.
15. 33/7 vá
* (a) corrected from 'uorþr', a superscript, 'orþr' deleted by subscript dots.
 (b) a later hand has crossed through the whole word.
16. * 36/2 'vollō' corrected from 'fiollō', v superscript, fi deleted by subscript dots.
17. * 38/3–4 'm̄ meins vara 7 morð vargar' first written 'm̄ morð vargar | meins vara 7', corrected by superscript signs over 'morð' and 'meins'.
18.  38/5 þannz: z erased, but still legible.
19. * 43/1 'mioc': m is clumsily written, as if the scribe first meant to write 'nu' or 'nv' (cf. 46/1, 55/1).
20. * 43/3 festr: f corrected from v.
21.  45/9–12 'ymr iþ aldna tre en iotvN losnar scelfr' on fol. 4, end of line 2, has been erased, but is still legible. The words are repeated on the following line.
22. * 3/3 'gēgr': *g*² corrected from n (crowded at the end of the line).
23. * 53/8 ryðia: r corrected from s (a repetition from preceding stoð).

24. * 53/12 niðs: s corrected from another tall letter, either l or more probably the first stroke of h (cf. 'niðhagr' fol. 19, line 29).
 25. * 60/3 'byrir' altered by the original scribe from 'bvir' (which must be correct).
 26.  62/3 'neþan' is followed by a word ('nepp?') at the end of the line. It has been erased, probably by a later hand.
 27. * 62/4 'niþa': a corrected from u.

E. MS. variants of the dwarf-names in Vqluspá 10 – 16¹⁰

- 10/1 R 1. motsognir R, B, motsogni A, moðsognir H, T, U, W, mo[ð]sognir SR (torn) 10/4 R 2. dvrin R, H, SR, T, W, dyrin U (cf. dvrnir A, B)
 11/1–4 R 3. nyi all MSS.
 4. niþi all MSS.
 5. norðri all MSS.
 6. suðri all MSS.
 7. æstri all MSS.
 8. vestri R, H, SR, T, U, W
 9. alþiofr R, H, U, W, A, B, alþiolfr SR, T
 10. dvalin all MSS. See 55. below.
-
- (not in R) 11. nær H, SR, T, U, W, A, narr B
 12. naiñ H, SR, T, U, W, A, B
 13. nipingr H, SR, T, W, niningr U (cf. nifængr A, B)
 14. daiñ H, SR, T, U, W
-
- 11/5–8 R 15. bivær R, bifvr H, SR, W, bifr T, bivor U, bivor A, B
 16. bavær R, bafvr H, SR, bafr T, bavr U, bauur W, blavor A, bavor B
 17. bambur R, bōmbvr H, bavbavr SR, baumbr T, bambavr U, bvmbvr A, B
 18. nori R, H, SR, T, U, W
 19. an R, H, oriñ T, or U, ori W (not in SR). See 64. below.
 20. anar R, onar H, SR, T, W, A, B, anar U
 21. ai R, H, W, A, B, Oiñ SR, T, oñi U
 22. mioðvitnir R, H, T, U, W, A, B, moð- SR
-
- 12/1–8 R 23. veigr R, ueggr H, vigr SR, T, W, viGr U
 24. gandalf R, H, SR, T, U, W, B, gandalf A

25. vindalfr all MSS.
 26. þrain R, þoriñ H, SR, T, U, W, A, B
 27. þeccr R, þrar H, A, B, þror SR, T, W, þior U
 28. þorin R, U, A, B, þrain H, þroi SR, T, W
 29. þror R, H, A, B, þeckr SR, W, A, B, þetr T (not in U)
 30. vitr R, U, A, B, litr H, SR, T, W
 31. litr R, U, A, B, vitr H, SR, T, W
 32. nar R, nyr H, SR, T, W, (following nyraþr) A, B (not in U)
 33. nyraþr all MSS.
 34. regin R, H, A, B, reckr SR, T, U, W, A, B (cf. H rekka, in place of dverg, 12/6, preceding regin)
 35. raðsuiðr all MSS.
-
- 13/1–4 R 36. Fili all MSS.
 37. Kili all MSS.
 38. fundin R, H, SR, T, U, W
 39. nali R, H, vali SR, T, U, W
 40. hepti R, hefti H } heptifili SR, T, U, W, A, B
 41. vili R, fili H
 42. hanar R, H, hannerr A, B, har SR, T, U, W, A, B. See 59. below.
 43. svior R, svidr H (see Bugge (a) ad loc.), siar SR, sniar T, segir U, sviar W
-
- (not in R, SnE) 44. billingr H
 45. bruni H
 46. billdr H
 47. buri H (cf. bvrin A, buin B)
-
- 13/5–8 R 48. frar R, fror H
 (not in SnE) 49. hornbori R, A, B, fornbugi H
 50. fręgr R, fręg H
 51. loni R, H (cf. liomi, loiñ A, B)
 52. ærvangr R, H (cf. ærvargr A, B)
 53. iari R, H (cf. iaki A)
 54. eikinskialldi R, H, A, B. See 73. below.
 55. dvalins R, dualins H. See 10. above.
 14/2 R 56. lofars R, H, lofar A, B, lovar SR, U, W
 14/4 R 57. dræpnir R, H, SR, T, W, A, B, draufnir H, dramir U
 15/1–4 R 58. dolgþrasir R, H, dolgþvari SR, T, U, W
 59. har R, H, U, havr SR, T, W. See 42. above.

¹⁰ I have not here reproduced the accents occasionally marked in the MSS. (e.g. nár, hár). Distinction is often difficult to make between 'u' and 'v' in the MSS. In U 'n' and 'ñ' are often very similar.

60. hægspori R, H, hvgstari SR, T, U, W, B, høgstari A
 61. hlevangr R, hlevargr H, hleðiolfr SR, W, hleðiofr T, hleipolfr U, hlioðolfr A, B
 62. gloi R, gloiñ H, SR, T, W, A, B, gloni U

- (not in R, H) 63. dori SR, T, U, W, A, duri B
 64. ori T, U, W, A, B (not in SR). See 19. above.
 65. dvfr SR, T, U, W, A, B
 66. andvari SR, T, U, W, B, andvarn A

- 15/5-6 R 67. scirv^{ir} R, U, W, A, B, skirf^{ir} H, T, skirpir SR
 68. virvir R, H, T, U, W, A, B, virpir SR
 69. scafiðr R, H, SR, T, U (defective, sk.fiðr), W, A, B
 70. ai R, H, SR, T, U, W. See 21. above.
 16/1-2 R 71. alfr all MSS.
 72. yngvi R, H, U, ingi SR, T, W
 73. eikinscialdi all MSS. (spelt -skialli U). See 54. above.

- 16/3-4 R 74. fialar R, falr SR, T, U, W (cf. farli A, B)
 (not in H) 75. frostri R, frosti SR, T, U, W, A, B
 76. fiñr R, fiðr SR, T, U, W, A, B
 77. giñar R, SR, T, U, W, A, B

- 16/8 R 78. lofars R, H. See 56. above.

All the dwarf-names in R occur also in the combined texts of H and SnE. H does not have the four names in 16/3-4 R. SnE does have these names. SnE does not have the sequence of seven names in 13/5-8 R. H does have this sequence. H has four names that are not in R or SnE: they are inserted between the sequences in 13/1-4 and 13/5-6 R.

H and SnE have four names that are not in R: they are inserted between the sequences 11/1-4 and 11/5-8 R.

It would seem that after the interpolation of the dwarf stanzas in *R II several additions and subtractions were made to the names listed, but none of these changes has disturbed the basic structure of the interpolation, beginning with the dwarfs' creation, telling of their migration and final establishment and fame: a unique record of unexpected tradition, made in an unfortunate place.

IV. The Christian Context of Vqluspá

The poet of Vqluspá must have lived, at some time of his life, in a community where Christian thought was familiar and he had come to comprehend at least certain aspects of it well. He has external effects in his poem that could come from eschatological homilies or apocalyptic visions of sinners in hell (44, 38).¹¹ The image of the bleeding Baldr (31), and of the weeping mother (33), recall Christian stereotypes. A native Norse genre of religious prophecy may have existed, to which Vqluspá conforms, but the only other record that might relate to it is the Irish account of Ota 'giving her answers' in Cluain Mic Nois (see commentary to 1/1), which allows us little insight into context or structure. The vqlva in Vqluspá is the only Nordic sibyl who expressly concerns herself with divine matters, in extant sources. Centuries before Vqluspá would have been composed, however, the pagan Sibyl of the classical world had an established place in Christian tradition, particularly since Augustine cited her song on the 'Sign of Judgement' in The City of God (c. 425), translating it from the original Greek into Latin.¹² In England the Greek text was translated independently into Latin by two poets c. 700.¹³ The Cantus Sibyllae was made part of the Christmas Office of the Church from the ninth to the eleventh century; from the late ninth century musical notation survives in about fifty liturgical MSS. throughout Europe.¹⁴ The Cantus, with its vivid portents and horrors as the earth breaks apart—and with its thrilling music—could have been heard by Norsemen in England. It is conceivable also that they could have known of Latin Sibylline Oracles, since one such Oracle has been discovered,¹⁵ that could have been known in the ninth century in the north of England, or even, much earlier, in Ireland.

This beautiful Latin poem of 136 lines, Prophetia Sibyllae magae, has many of the characteristics of the Greek Sibylline Oracles and some of Vqluspá. It is ¹¹ Belief in the approaching end of the world was so widespread in early Christendom, and, indeed, in pre-Christian belief, that it would always have been part of the intellectual context of the Europe the Norsemen knew. In 601 Pope Gregory the Great wrote to the recently converted Ethelbert of Kent that 'the End of the present world is already near . . . the unending kingdom of the Saints is approaching. As this same End of the world is drawing nigh, many unusual things will happen—climatic changes, terrors from heaven, unseasonable tempests, wars, famines, pestilences, earthquakes' (cited from McGinn 64; McGinn's book is an invaluable lucid documentation of the subject). Widespread, non-Christian concepts of the end of the world would seem to have blended readily with the Christian, as in Vsp and the OHG Muspilli (see McGinn 80-1). Four hundred years after King Ethelbert the Anglo-Saxon homilists were still confronting the same problem (see commentary to Vsp 38/3-4).

¹² St Augustine of Hippo, The City of God xviii. 23.

¹³ Bulst 105-6; P. Dronke (f), 10-12 and n. 15; UD (j), 5-6.

¹⁴ UD (j), n. 7.

¹⁵ P. Dronke (f), 16-23; UD (j), 4-9 (where the debate between A. C. Bang and Viktor Rydberg on the influence of the SO on Vsp is also discussed).

uttered by a virgin, dedicated to God, who writes her songs from his knowledge:

*Mundus origo mea est, animam de sidere traxi.
Intactum corpus concutit omne deus . . .
Carmina quae scribo, noverit illa deus . . .*

*The world is my origin, my soul I have drawn from a star,
All my virgin body God sets trembling . . .
The songs I write are those God has known . . .*

Her song now is of the glorious creation, of Christ's coming to take away the sins of the world, of the terrors those sins are bringing, of God's sorrow that he ever created man and redeemed him with his blood, as time runs out and the world is dwindling in decay. But the sibyl has faith that God will give to believers a new radiant world that will last forever: 'If I am worthy, may he take my soul and set it in a star'. Even from this brief glance at the Prophetia, we can see the striking differences of Vqluspá. Yet the likenesses—in the sibylline framework, in the historical-cosmological progress of the narrative within the frame—are almost as striking as the differences.¹⁶

The earliest of the three MSS. of the Prophetia are two from the ninth century: one of these stems from Tours or a scriptorium influenced by Tours. Alcuin of York was Abbot of Tours from 794 to 804. The link between the Carolingian and the Anglo-Saxon schools was strong. It is conceivable that the Prophetia could have been known, therefore, in England, and especially in the north.

The Prophetia may well have been composed in seventh century Spain.¹⁷ This is a time when strong links can be traced between Spain and Ireland: apocryphal legends that are otherwise preserved only in Spain appear in seventh and eighth century Ireland.¹⁸ At least two routes would therefore be open for the transmission of a Latin sibylline poem to the British Isles.

These are the external features of Vqluspá that appear to reflect Christian modes. More startling is the analogy between inner motivation in the poem and a Christian theological theme. Loki is given an elaborate Judas-role to play. He must achieve the killing of Baldr. He has already prepared for the gods the preliminary moral path to misfortune—their *orlog*¹⁹—by making it impossible for them not to break their oaths (26): did he not recommend

¹⁶ See Excursus below.

¹⁷ P. Dronke (f), 16, and n. 24.

¹⁸ Dumville (b), 321–4.

¹⁹ See Vqluspá Introduction II, stanza 28; I have attempted a fuller analysis of the moral structure of Vsp, compared with that of the Prophetia, in UD (j), 9–16. Cf. also Lks 25. The act of Loki in entangling the gods in oath-breaking in the giant builder story would already be in the traditions known to the poet of Vsp, to be used by him as he planned his theme. In its original context Loki's act would be as well-meaning as Frigg's maternal decision not to ask the little mistletoe for its oath.

granting the giant builder his horse, on which the builder's success depended (SnE 45)? Then he shatters the defences round Baldr's life by finding the weak spot, the mistletoe. When Baldr is killed, the gods send the valiant Hermóðr to ask Hel for Baldr's release, and Hel agrees, if he proves to be so deeply loved that every thing in the world will weep for him (SnE 66–7). Loki must now refuse to weep; and so he does. Baldr remains in Hel until the earth is reborn for him to dwell in and to bless.

In achieving Baldr's death Loki is performing Óðinn's will: Óðinn was shown the secret of Baldr's sacrifice by the vqlva (31), and Baldr's killing is enacted in the manner of an Odinic sacrifice (32). So too in achieving Christ's death Judas was performing God's will. If Judas had repented before betraying Christ, God would have had to find some other way of making Judas bring about Christ's death and with it the redemption of the world. The devil wanted the crucifixion stopped, because Christ crucified would harrow hell, take from the devil all his subjects, his empire of death. So the tradition grew up that the dream of Pilate's wife (Matthew 27: 19) was inspired by the devil, to make her persuade her husband that Jesus was a just man and not to be condemned.²⁰ Judas's sin was permitted by God or it would not have happened. A vqlva's prophecy is a fitting place to present such problems of predestination.

The death that all creatures weep for—that of Christ, that of Baldr—is also a death they give thanks for, because it is a relighting of life: Lumen Christi—Deo Gratias in the Mass for Holy Saturday, as the candles are relit. Loki disguises himself as a giantess called Þökk, 'Thankfulness', when he visits Frigg and learns that the mistletoe never swore not to harm Baldr. He keeps this disguise too when he is asked to weep for Baldr: Þökk mun gráta / þurru tárur / Baldrs bálfarar, 'Thankfulness will weep with dry tears at Baldr's burning' (SnE 67–8). His alias is, I suggest, an allusion to the Christian thanksgiving (and a hint that Loki knows perfectly well his own theological role).

²⁰ In Matthaei evangelium expositio IV. xxvii, PL 92, col 121 (Carolingian commentary, c. 750–800, wrongly attributed to Bede; McNally 106): Hac enim vice, non ante, se intellexit diabolus per Christi mortem nudandum, et spolia humani generis sive in mundo, sive apud tartaros, amissurum: et ideo satagebat per mulierem, per quam spolia mortis invaserat, Christum eripere de manibus Judæorum, ne per illius mortem ipse amitteret mortis imperium ('For not before this moment did the devil perceive that he was to be despoiled by the death of Christ and that he would lose his prize of the human race, both in this world and in hell; and therefore he set about snatching Christ from the hands of the Jews, by means of a woman—the same means through which he had seized the prize of death'). There are earlier, but more remote, references to the devil's use of Pilate's wife (e.g. the apocryphal letters of St. Ignatius to the Philippians IV refer to the devil's disturbance of her dreams; Padres Apostólicos 528). On the motif of Pilate's wife, Procula, in drama see Sticca 95–9. In verses of Eriugena († c. 870) the Devil blames himself for the death of Christ: 'Had I recognized the man, he had never hung upon the cross. / The lowly form of his human body undid my wits' (Eriugena 92–3, lines 49–50).

The long intrigue of Baldr's killing in Snorra Edda seems like a loose-limbed dramatic sequence of comic and tragic scenes, with more than a hint of burlesque.²¹ Loki's trickster role of disguise and deceit has been a witty one in Snorri's sources, but in Vqluspá his deeds are not found funny. When the vqlva recognizes his chained figure beneath Cauldrons' Grove (34), she sees it as malignant; but the scene of Þökk's refusal to weep (to which the vqlva alludes in her term áþekkian) can never have been anything but impudently comic.²² That in the tenth century there should have been in ON a near-fabliau treatment of sacred matters, Christian and heathen, does not necessarily reflect the irreligiosity of the heathen²³ (cf. the relationship of God and the devil in the Book of Job). Judas as a comedian can already be seen in outline in a legend in a homily in the Leabhar Breac: when he saw the suffering inflicted on Christ 'a kind of repentance seized him' and he flung back the thirty pieces in the temple. On the third day, when Christ would rise from the dead, Judas deliberately hanged himself, so that his soul would be in hell when Christ came to harrow it and it would be one of the first saved. 'But Jesus did not allow the soul of Judas to go to hell till he had brought the Captivity from thence, so that the soul of Judas was the first soul on which hell closed after that.'²⁴ Jesus has out-tricked the trickster. I think it not impossible that Christian apocryphal stories of this kind could have helped to shape the role of Loki in the Norse legend of Baldr.

If we seek for analogues for some of the key events in the story of Baldr's death the closest are Christian, from Ireland and Anglo-Saxon England:

1. Hǫðr, whose shaft struck Baldr, was blind; so too was Longinus, whose spear pierced Christ on the cross. In the poems (c. 750–70) of Blathmac (213–32), after 'they tore from him his pure raiment' and 'lots

²¹ In Hrafn's Saga Sveinbjarnarsonar 10–11, ch. 7, a man involved in a killing offers his head to the son of the dead man (and is granted it; c. 1197). A local ditty was made up at the time: Hvatvetna grét / — hefi ek þat fregit: / bysn þótti þat — / Baldr ór helju. / Þó hefir hæra, / þá er hǫfuð sæði, / Þormóðr þóttit. / Þat er ólogit. 'Everything wept—so I have heard: a weird thing it was—[? to get] Baldr out of Hel. Yet more loudly, when he proffered his head, did Þormóðr howl. That is not telling a lie.' Would this allusion have made much impact in the district if there had not been noisy popular reenactments of 'Baldr's story' for general entertainment?

²² The second half of Þökk's stanza is as insensitively rude as Loki can make it: Kyks né dauðs / nautka ek karls sonar: / haldi Hel því, er hefir! 'Alive or dead, I had no use for the old fellow's son: let Hel hold on to what she has!' Such broad iconoclasm would be very popular.

²³ See Flower 102 on the relationship of pagan and Christian sentiment in Ireland: 'The hero and the saint rail upon one another in good set terms. The extreme expression of this conflict is in the quatrain which the Irish-speaking peasantry of to-day still declaim with a peculiar pleasure: "If I saw God and Oscar hand to hand on a hill, were I to see Oscar down, I would say that God is a strong man." This is not, as some have thought, evidence of a pagan reaction or of medieval anti-clericalism; it is with the poets who composed and the peasants who repeat the poems merely the delight in developing the implications of a situation to their last extreme'. It seems to me that this delight is much in evidence in some of the Irish Biblical Apocrypha.

²⁴ See Dumville (b), 302–3.

were cast' for it, 'when they thought thus that Jesus could be approached, Longinus then came to slay him with the spear'; this pierced his heart, and with his blood Christ quickly cured 'the fully blind man who, openly with his two hands, was plying the lance'. The allusive text seems to imply that the blind Longinus was brought by others to kill Christ, when they thought the moment was right (i.e. ? when his raiment would not be spoiled). The blindness of Longinus is first mentioned in Western tradition by Blathmac, and first clearly illustrated in an Irish gospel book of c. 800.²⁵

2. Hermóðr's visit to Hel to release Baldr has the outlines of the Harrowing of Hell, in which Hermóðr has the role of Christ and Baldr that of the holy dead held in captivity. This originally unorthodox belief is documented in Ireland and Spain as early as the seventh century,²⁶ and in an Anglo-Saxon MS. from the early ninth century, 'The Book of Cerne', itself a copy of an eighth century Northumbrian MS., there is preserved a remarkable representation of the Harrowing of Hell, with choruses of holy ones and utterances of Adam and Eve—perhaps 'our earliest surviving example of Christian dramatic literature, written specifically to be acted'.²⁷

3. The weeping of all creation for Baldr has its Old English counterpart in the Dream of the Rood: Wēop eal gesceaft, / cwiðdon Cyninges fyll. / Crīst wæs on rōde. 'All creation wept, bewailed the King's fall. Christ was on the cross' (55–6). This poem is in a late tenth century MS. Citations from the same poem, however, are cut in runic letters on the margins of two carved panels on the Ruthwell Cross in Dumfriesshire. The OE dialect is Northumbrian and the Cross most probably from 700–50. Here, on one of the fragmentary upper panels, are preserved the runes]dægisgæf[, perhaps representing an original wæpðæ gisgæft, corresponding to the Dream of the Rood's wēop eal gesceaft.²⁸ Where there are parallel passages in inscription and poem, the wording is closely similar; the part of the poem from which the citations are drawn might well be from the time of the Ruthwell Cross itself.²⁹ In Blathmac the sun 'mourned its lord' (241–2), God's elements keened their hero (257–64).

If the extant Norse traditions of Baldr are so greatly influenced by traditions of Christ, could it be that the Norse legend of Baldr was in fact a ²⁵ Figurally, the healing of Longinus's blindness signifies the revelation of truth to the unbeliever (see Dumville (b), 306–7). Christ's healing of the blind man (Mark 10: 46–52) is depicted on the Ruthwell Cross, no doubt for the same figural reason.

²⁶ Dumville (b), 301, 321–30.

²⁷ Dumville (a), 374–406 (citation 381 n. 22); also P. Dronke (h), xxvi–xxviii for discussion and substantial citation, with translation of the text.

²⁸ See Howlett 91 for discussion.

²⁹ See the helpful edition of the Dream of the Rood by B. Dickins and A. S. C. Ross.

wholly Christian invention? I would think this improbable, because too many pre-Christian foundations are visible: the sacrificial killing of the king at the will of the god; the cyclic fratricide of the consort of the goddess, establishing the ancient role of the bróðurbani; the reincarnation, or return to life, of the killed one; the weeping for the lost lord.³⁰ We have no extant Norse analogue for Hermóðr's ride to Hel to release a captive of death. If Freyja, in her search for Óðr, had reached the gates of Hel, she would probably have received the same answer to her quest as Aphrodite did: that Hel was holding her lover captive until the spring. That Baldr stays in Hel until the resurgence of the earth is part of the heathen pattern, not the Christian.³¹ That the Norse legend of Baldr was intended to be a heathen legend and understood as such is perhaps confirmed by the euhemerization of the legend by the Christian poet of Beowulf 2430–40.

Readers of Vqluspá will wish to make their own assessments of the character of the poem and its genesis. I present material towards this assessment, some of it new in the context; there is certainly more to be found. I do not think, from the close of the poem with its confident return of a multiplicity of deities, that the poet was himself a Christian, but that he admired the Christian religion well enough to idealize the world after Ragnarøk in near-Christian terms, and that he enjoyed the sophisticated paths of Christian theology as much as his Irish friends did, and the breadth of Christian sibylline vision. At the same time he built his theme by allusions to purely heathen material—the gods' disastrous tafl-game, the Æsir–Vanir war, the giant builder, Hœnir the priest, 'bird of dawning'—in a way that only a Norse audience learned in heathen lore could savour and—probably—only a Norse court of heathen-born skalds could provide. His range of vqlur figures suggests a variety of lively social, as well as poetic, tradition behind their depiction, which the literary oracular Sibyls cannot match. As most readers of Vqluspá have felt, the poet must have lived through the last decades of the tenth century and probably into the eleventh, familiar with heathen and Christian courts, but with the freedom of an Icelander subject to none of them.

³⁰ On these pre-Christian motifs see Vsp commentary on 31/2, 32/5–8, 1/2, 25/8.

³¹ A seasonal pattern of captivity and delayed release probably existed side by side with a shamanic pattern of the rescue from death without seasonal delay by the shaman saviour. So traditions of Orpheus have both the loss of Eurydice and her rescue (see P. Dronke (a), 198–215, on Orpheus as figura of Christ 206–10).

Excursus: some motifs compared in Vqluspá and Sibylline Oracles³²

1. The Sibyl herself

In Vqluspá three types of sibylline figure are used: (a) Vqlva A ('I', the speaker of the poem, addressing mankind; (b) Vqlva B ('she', and briefly 'I' in one dramatic episode from the past), whose memories, thoughts, actions, and visions of past, present, and future are reported by Vqlva A; (c) Vqlva C ('she'), a narrative figure in a myth of the past, Heiðr.

In SO there is only one sibyl ('I'), speaking the Oracle.

(i) Her origins

Vqlva A declares she was fostered long ago by giants and remembers an archaic underworld. She lays claim, therefore, to great age, but does not (I think) specify her parentage.

Vqlva B lives within the world of the gods and is consulted by them. We are not told her origins, but if it is she who 'will sink' at the end of the poem (as I think the poet intends—or allows: he keeps the outlines of the vqlur figures A and B deliberately indefinite), we must suppose her to belong also to the world of the dead.

Vqlva C appears to be a human metamorphosis of Gullveig, an icon of Freyja, re-enacting a myth that Vqlva B remembers happening.

In SO, in so far as her origins are mentioned, the Sibyl is variously:

1. A daughter-in-law of Noah, speaking in the age after the flood (I 287, III 827);
2. An intimate (γυνωστή) of Isis in Egypt (V 53, 484);
3. A daughter of Priam and Hecuba (TS 264);
4. Platonically described as a creature of the world, whose soul is drawn from a star (Prophetia 1).

In none of the SO is the Sibyl associated with the primordial world (as is Vqlva A), but rather with an antique historical age.

³² The Greek texts referred to here are from Kurfess (Oracles I–VIII and XI, dating from the second century BC to the second century AD); English translations by Collins (a), 317–472. For the Latin Tiburtine Sibyl see Kurfess 264–79; for the Greek earlier version see Alexander. For the Prophetia Sibyllae magae see Bischoff 150–71 for the full text; English translation (not very close at some points) in New Testament Apocrypha. In citations and paraphrases the English rendering is my own. In references to the SO I give the number of the Oracle followed by the first line only of a passage (which may be fairly long). For recent authoritative surveys of the problem of the Sibylline books see Collins (b), and Momigliano. For documentation of the ancient Greek Sibyl (from whom, despite her fame, no texts survive: she belongs to such antiquity) see Rohde II. 21, n. 1, 63–9, 413–14 (on double persona and ἐκστασις).

(ii) Her status and moral stature

Völva A has a priestess-like authority; she is a link between god and men, telling them of their past, as Óðinn asks her to. She speaks as his equal. It is unthinkable that she could be touched by moral censure.

Völva B is not in contact with human society, except in her communication with Völva A. She has little reverence for the gods. She is not a priestess, but, in the one close portrayal of her, hermit-like, and avaricious. She could castigate the world with pleasure (44).

Völva C represents a 'holy woman' of a less reputable, but more realistic kind, roaming to the hospitality of one farm after another, flattering, fortune-telling, sharing secrets with the women. She does not get her occult wisdom from a deity, but from spirits, when she is 'possessed'. Her behaviour is morally censured by some.

In SO the Sibyl is never said to be a priestess (there were no priestesses in Jewish or Christian tradition), though she is driven to her prophecies by God (I 5; II 1; III 1, 162, 297, 490, 821; IV 1, 18; VIII 359; IX 322). Only the first Sibyl opens her Oracle by stating that it was God's command to her to inform mankind how the world was made: 'Now, defiled Man, take good note that you do not scorn my instruction, that comes from the most exalted Lord . . .' (I 5; nothing could be further from the glowing and complimentary words of Völva A, courteously requesting silence). The literary ancestry of the Sibyl as a heathen priestess or pythoness can sometimes be glimpsed: she is an intimate servant of Isis, concerned with oracle and temple (V 53); she declares she is not the oracle-teller of false Phoebus, but of mighty God, and she speaks with holy mouth (IV 4, 6, 22; also XI 315); she is reviled and persecuted by the Greeks, called shameless prophetess, daughter of Circe, raving sibyl of falsehood, but she will in the end be revealed as a true prophetess of God (III 813; there is a touch of similarity here with the Æsir's view of Heiðr). In the Greek SO the Sibyl may claim to be God's high prophetess, but it is never said that she is recognized as such. She is not (like Völva A) in harmony with her audience, but more often a voice crying in the wilderness. Only the Tiburtine Sibyl bears some resemblance to Völva A in her calm control and sense of sacred occasion: she is a woman of rank, the Emperor of Troy sends an embassy to escort her, the Roman senators approach her with deference; she refuses to reveal the sacred mystery of their dream in the pagan filth of the Capitol, but asks that they proceed to the Aventine (where her prescient mind no doubt told her the earliest Roman churches were to be built).

In SO the Sibyl may be a wanderer (as is Völva C). She has been commanded by God to go prophesying throughout the world, addressing its kings; she leaves the walls of Babylon to bring warning to the Greeks (III 162, 810). She goes from city to city (VIII 3); the Tiburtine Sibyl moves from continent to continent (TS 264).

While the Sibyl may be unjustly reviled by those who reject her terrible warnings (III 813), in other SO she passionately associates herself with the evil of the world and confesses her own devastatingly immoral life—whoredom, harshness to the poor, abortion of an incestuous child (II 339, VII 159). In II the confession ends with a prayer for mercy; in VII (which has the more sensational exposure of crimes) the confession ends with a prayer to the people to stone her, so that with death she may atone for her evil life and lift up her eyes to heaven. She is an extreme Magdalene figure, the opposite of the virginal, cloistered Sibyl of the Prophetia.

2. The moments of time(i) Cyclic time

In Völuspá a cyclic chronological structure is finely worked out from the beginnings of the cosmos to its disintegration and renewal. The parallel between the emergence of the first earth and the second is distinctly marked, as between the first golden age and the second. It would seem to be the same earth returning, green once more, the same golden chequers found in the grass, the same Odinic precincts that the young, reborn gods inhabit. The Norse poet appears to emphasize the identity of the old and the new, the past and the present, as in a cycle of nature.

In SO in no one text is the history of the cosmos traced from its beginning to dissolution and renewal as in Völuspá. Elements of such a pattern are discernible now in this poem, now in that, but these fragments of allusion may be remnants of a more archaic conception of cosmic renewal that had no fundamental place in Jewish or Christian theology and was replaced by the belief in renewal through moral worth. The first Sibyl, who describes with ardour the golden age after the Flood—the happy age in which she herself lived, when all was in God's care (I 283)—makes no return to this theme (in her extant text). The fourth Sibyl frames her denunciation of the ten ages of nations after the Flood within an exaltation of God's creation of terrestrial beauty for man—'shadowy night . . . and streaming sun . . . fish-teeming ocean . . . perpetual springs . . . the vine and the olive'—all to be destroyed through the rejection of God by man—and the restoration of that world after the Judgement. 'Miserable man, repent . . . cast away swords . . . and the killing of men, and pride. Purify your whole body in ever-flowing rivers . . . stretch your hands to heaven and beg forgiveness . . . God will have pity, he will not destroy you.' He will burn everything to black ashes, but when all is burnt, he will resurrect men and judge them and give life and imperishable riches to the righteous. When they see the glorious sun they will thank him. 'Happy is the man who will live then on earth' (IV 10, 162). So the loving act of creation is performed a second time.

(ii) The present moment and the signs of the end

In Vqluspá the present moment in which Vqlva A speaks is the 'real' present moment, that of the poet and his audience. In relation to the gods' history this present moment comes after the weeping (33) and the punishment (34) for Baldr's death, and before Ragnarök (45 onwards). The present is, then, the ominous and emphatic lull before the sound of Heimdallr's horn, when for the first time in the poem the moral evil in the world of men is laid bare in the vqlva's vision in eschatological scenes of expiation (38). Portents of the end of the physical world begin to appear (40) and the dog of death can be heard barking (43). It is the 'now' of every man's life, full of warning and guilt.

In the Prophetia the present moment is, as in Vqluspá, the 'real' present, since it is a homily for men who will soon face judgement. But in the Greek SO the present may be a fictional moment chosen from the remote past—just after the Flood (I 287), or the building of the Tower of Babel (VIII 4), for example—so that the Sibyl may recount after that mythical time the fall of all the great historical empires through their arrogance and vice and wars. Her prophecies ex eventu give credence to her vision of the end of the world to come (cf. IV 49–151, V 1–246, etc.). Not once, therefore, but many times in the course of a SO the moral evils of man may be described (III 492, 545, 601, V 89, 166, 386), and the horrors of God's wrath upon the wicked and sure hope of his protection for the pious continually recur (II 6, 52, 154, etc.).

The signs of the end in SO are elaborate: fantasy, superstition, and a ghastly realism all play their part (as in Vqluspá): drops of blood fall on the earth, stones speak, a battle is seen in the clouds; sun will sink into ocean and rise no more; in a great famine men will eat their parents; after the evil wars the sea will be so crammed with human flesh that it will be easy to count the few men and women left alive; in the last age there will be the premature senility of man: children will grow grey-haired in their sleep, men will be imbecile of wit and women barren (III 799, V 466, II 154). Weeping and dirge will be the sounds of the last days (II 157, V 350, 476), and indeed the Sibyl herself may see her whole Oracle as a lament: 'O wretched Rhodes, for you first I shall shed my tears' (VII 1). Only once in the SO does a sibyl say she 'saw' portents (V 512): 'I saw the threat of a blazing sun in the stars / and the ghastly wrath of a moon in the lightning. / The stars were in travail, big with war: God set them fighting. / ... Lucifer directed the battle, mounted on the Lion's back ...' It is the seasons in conflict, a war of constellations and signs of the zodiac, which rages until Ouranos strikes down the fighters. Falling, they set all the earth ablaze. The sky is left starless.

(iii) The last battle and the end of the world

The SO show no great interest in a last battle between God and his enemies before the ending of the world, such as we find in Vqluspá. Only the Oracle of Baalbek (an earlier version in Greek of TS) and TS itself have a decisive battle between God and Antichrist. In the Greek text, Antichrist, the last earthly ruler, 'son of perdition', who turns the sun into darkness and the moon into blood, will be slain with all his host by Christ, who will come from heaven like a flashing star (OB 29). In the Latin, the Archangel Michael will, by God's power, slay Antichrist on the Mount of Olives (TS 279).

So catastrophic have been the signs of the end of the world, that the end itself hardly outclasses them. For one Sibyl the old world ends in cosmic darkness lit by a stream of fire from heaven that annihilates everything—even Hades—while the stars crash into one whole and fall into the sea (II 194); for another, God will shake the earth and tear down mountains, so that every cleft will be filled with corpses (III 672); for yet another, the world will bellow when earth, men, cities, and sea are burned up by God (IV 173). Most perfectly, the elements of the cosmos will cease to exist when God shall fold up heaven like a book, and the sky fall on earth and sea, and a tireless torrent of fire melt all creation into one, resolving it into purity (II 80, 212). The cosmos will be no cosmos—ἔσται κόσμος ἄκοσμος—when mankind has gone from it (VII 123).

(iv) The new earth

The new earth that materializes after the destruction of the old is only for the blessed: a radiant realm of life free from cares, where triple springs of wine, milk, and honey flow—an earth free to all men, without walls or fences, that brings forth fruit of its own accord—a life of wealth without masters—no beggary or slavery, no seasons, no morning or night—only a 'great daylight' (II 313, 29; also III 371, 620, 741, 767, V 381, VII 146, VIII 206). It is not said in any of the SO how the new earth will come into being, nor where it will be. Angels take the blessed up to it, 'where the deathless path of mighty God leads' (II 315). The sons of God live in peace round the temple and God protects them 'as if encircling them with a wall of blazing fire' (III 702). In the Prophetia, more simply, the new world is pure radiance:

*Ipse pater nivei latens in limine mundi
Ipse dabit nitorem suis consistere sanctis.*

The father himself, secluded in the precincts of that snowy world, himself will give his saints right to rest in that radiance.

(74-5)

For the Norse poet the old warrior image of human happiness as the dwelling together of a band of loyal men under a golden roof—more glittering than the gilded shields on Valhöll—as secure from all vengeful foes as they are free from guilt, on Gimlé—is good enough to be an image of heaven.

COMMENTARY ON THE TEXT

1/1 Hlióðs bið ek: the call for hearing, silence, establishes the situation of speaker and audience. No other Eddic poem begins in this way. Tenth century court poets, however, used such openings; so Glúmr Geirason presents his poem, symbolized as Óðinn's drink:

*Hljóði, hapta beiðis May generous princes listen!
hefk, mildingar, gildi! I have the gods' commander's drink!*
(Gráfeldardrápa 1)

and Eyvindr Finnsson:

Vilja'k hljóð I should like silence at Hárs líði . . . for Óðinn's liquor . . .
(Háleygjatal 1)

Tacitus noted (Germ xi) that the priests had the right of control over Gmc assemblies and it was they who called for silence: Silentium per sacerdotes, quibus tum et coercendi ius est, imperatur. The vplva in Vsp appears to combine sacral and skaldic traditions, which may always have been deliberately associated in heathen times, when skalds presented their verse as the inspiration of Óðinn. Norse historical sources do not record any vplva addressing an audience in a temple or a hallowed assembly. The Irish chronicle Cogadh Gaedhel re Gallaibh, 'The War of the Gaedhil with the Gaill', however, records that, when the Viking Turgeis plundered the monasteries of Meath and Connacht, c. 838, 'Cluain Mic Nois was taken by his wife. It was on the altar of the great church she used to give her answers—afreacartha' (226; cf. 12-13 and n. 8 for the later MS.). As a vplva, Turgeis's wife Ota would be answering men's questions about the hidden matters that caused them anxiety. This traditional interrogation of the vplva is reflected in the phrases in Vsp 28/5: Hvers fregnið mik? 27/8, etc.: Vitoð ér enn, eða hvat? (also BDr 8/2-4, etc.: Pik vil ek fregna . . . vil ek enn vita; Hynðl 31/1-4, etc.: Mart segium þér . . . viltu enn lengra?). The old interrogatory practice is grandiosely extended in the fiction of Vsp, where the vplva is asked by Óðinn to reveal cosmic knowledge to the whole of mankind: whereby she gains a Sibylline dignity (see Vsp Introd iv). We may note that the sacral dignity of the Gmc seeress is fiercely challenged by Bruder (151-62, 'Die Frau im sakralen Bereich: Die Seherin') on the grounds that the idealized evidence of Tacitus in his Germania is virtually contradicted in his Historiae (as well as in other classical sources); and that the seeress was agent only of a lower form of cult, namely that of magic, without a genuine function or high rank in her society. If Bruder were wholly right, then the vplva of Vsp might indeed owe her towering stature entirely to the Christian Sibyl. But Ota was the wife of a chieftain, evidently performing a traditional function in her society. The North Gmc seeress at least seems to have known her worth and been revered for it. It is the goddesses who are most valued for their visionary powers (Lks 21, 29), and vplur who are consulted by Óðinn.

1/1–2 allar helgar kindir, 'all the hallowed families (of men)', syntactically parallel to mogo Heimdallar, 1/4 (DH). The senses of kind (cognate with Lat gens) range from 'begotten being', 'progeny' (cf. leysa kind frá konom, 'to deliver offspring from women', Sigrdr 9/3; Fenris kindir, 'creatures begotten by Fenrir', Vsp 39/4) to 'species', 'race' in sg. only (cf. Svíá kind, 'the race of Swedes', Ytal 5/11; Hrímnis kindar, 'of the giant Hrímnir's species', Hyndl 32/6; rogna kindar, 'of the race of the divine powers', Hyndl 35/4). The pl. kindir is not recorded used of the gods. To interpret the phrase as relating to the gods would be contextually and idiomatically incorrect.

helgar: as an epithet for human beings, heilagr is rare except for saints, but that may only reflect our lack of heathen sources. The vplva calls mankind 'hallowed' here to invest them with their sacred stature and privileges: (a) they are helgir as sons of Heimdallr, the only god whom Snorri describes individually as heilagr, SnE 32; like the Christian 'sons of God', they are holy because their god is holy, cf. Sancti estote, quia ego sanctus sum, Dominus Deus vester, Leviticus 19: 2, 1 Peter 1: 15–16; (b) as true worshippers of the gods, they are allowed to enter the hallowed ground of this sacred assembly (not like the Christian poet Sigvatr, who was barred from a Swedish house, where Óðinn-worship was being held, because they said that the place was holy, sögðu . . . heilagt, Austrfararvísur 4; (c) they have divine protection because they are innocent of crime, fríðhelgir (not like Vígfúss Víga-Glúms-son, who, after killing a man, might not stay at his home, which had a temple to Freyr, fyrir helgi staðarins, 'because of the holiness of the place', Víga-Glúm 66). Legal terminology based on heilagr continues in Christian times (helga, 'to proclaim inviolate'; helgi, 'immunity from attack'). The heroic name Helgi in the Helgi lays relates to his hallowed immunity from final death. Helgi endrborinn is a fabulous symbol of perpetual rebirth (see the close of HHv and HH II). To address mankind as helgar kindir is therefore a most fitting opening that the vplva has chosen for her spá, whose theme is the renewal of life. De Boor notes the transition from the realistic concept of the human assembly to the idealization of the whole of mankind assembled there (218, n. 22: 'Diese richtig aufgefasste reale Grundvorstellung wird durch allar und die Apposition der nächsten Zeile zu ideeller Allgemeinheit gesteigert.'). See also Baetke (a), 122–54.

1/3–4 meiri — Heimdallar: reference is to the three estates of men, at whose begetting Heimdallr–Rígr assisted. In Ríg we see him entering homes from the lowest to the highest; in Hyndl 43 he is said to be 'related by marital bond to each and every dwelling' (sif sifiaðan / siftom giprvollom).

meiri ok minni, 'of greater and lesser social importance', is elsewhere found only in prose texts. That it was common in the Norse pre-literary period, however, is shown by the ME hybrid phrase mare/more and minne (a frequent poetic tag; cf. MED s.v. min(ne adj. 1)). In OE equivalent phrases māran would be contrasted with mætran or læssan (see BT s.vv.).

Heimdallar: the nom. Heimdallr is confirmed by the rhyme with fallinn in Húsdr 10/4 (SnE 90). There would be no reason for simplifying -ll- in the gen. Dallr, however, is a rare, probably archaic, word for 'tree', recorded as such ('arbor prolifera') only in Biörn Haldorsen's Lexicon. Both Haldorsen and Blöndal gloss dallr/dallur signifying a bowl of wood (with lid and handle) for liquid food (in northern Iceland). Elsewhere, such a bowl was called askr/askur, presumably because it was made of wood (not necessarily ash-wood). By analogy, a wooden bowl might be called dallr because it was made from the wood of a tree/dallr (again, not necessarily of a specific tree). The nom. form Heimdallr occurs once (SnE 99), the gen. form Heimdalar eleven times (Pipping 1. 7). Dalr is a poetic term for 'bow' (gen. dals and dalar; LP s.v.), listed in Pulur IV (Skjald B 1. 665), SnE 203, beside almr, 'elm-wood bow', and ýr, 'yew-wood bow'; dalr may have become a bow-heiti because dalr also was a tree name, a variant, presumably, of dallr. The ram-heiti Heimdali (gen. -dala) in Pulur IV aa (Skjald B 1. 670), SnE 210, may have arisen from popular interchangeability of -dall- and -dal- in Heimdallr's name. The ram may have been named after the god both because it was the proper sacrifice to the god, sharing his identity (see Tolley (a), 344–6), and because, like the god, he was the father of flocks (kindir). No doubt it was in this shepherding capacity that he listened to the growing of the grass and of his sheep's wool (see Vsp Introd II c. 1 (iii) (b) (1)). On the mythologems associated with Heimdallr see Pipping, Eddastudier, esp. 1; Tolley (a), 326–61, 'The god Heimdallr as a hypostasis of the world axis'; UD (i), 666–76, 'Arbor parens: god as world tree and world pillar'.

1/5 Vildo i.e. Vilt þú. For the inverted and assimilated form of the 2nd person sg. pres. indic., when not interrogative, cf. Háv 45/3: vildu; Hárb 48/2, 3: mundo . . . muntu; Bugge (a), 34, n. *.

I assume that the poet here implies a situation that may often have been a real one in heathen times, namely that a speaker addresses the statue of a god before an audience, either in the temple itself, or brought out to the þing. Adam of Bremen II. lxii refers to a statue of Þórr in Sweden stans in concilio paganorum (it is unlikely that in concilio here would mean within the temple at Uppsala, as the footnote to the text suggests). In Vsp the vplva addresses the (image of the) god with a direct familiarity, much as Óláfr Tryggvason is represented as addressing the image of Freyr at the Þrándheimr assembly (Flat 1. 402): 'Nú skal ek prófa þik, Freyr, hvárt þú mátt mæla ok svara mér', 'Now I shall put you to the test, Freyr, and see whether you can speak and answer me'. The saga writer implies that the Christian is, with sarcastic punctiliousness, according the same respect to the stolid image as a heathen worshipper would, by assuming that it possessed living senses.

Valföðr: in the temple at Uppsala Óðinn was depicted armed (Adam of Bremen IV. xxvi: Wodanem vero sculpunt armatum). The name the vplva chooses to address him with here would be apt for his image as god of war (which is much emphasized in the poem: Valföðr(s), 1/5, 27/7, 28/13; Herföðr, 29/1; Heriaföðrs, 42/4; Sigföður, 52/2).

We are never told that Óðinn had priestesses in his cult (as Freyr had), but the Óðinn-worship in Sweden, from which Sigvatr was excluded (see commentary to 1/1–2), appears to have been in the charge of a woman. I think it probable that the poet intends to convey a similar functionary role for his vplva, with the setting of the assembly and the hint of a statue of the god. Any religious function the vplur possessed would be lost in a society converted to Christianity, while the ‘secular’ magic, protective spells, clairvoyance, could continue to thrive (as the written sources suggest they did; cf. Eiríks Saga rauða ch. 4).

1/6 fyr telia, ‘expound before this audience’. The phrase, common in prose, but not found elsewhere in verse, implies the setting out of the facts of a case (cf. Íslb 17: talði fyrir mǫnnum á marga vega, at þat skyldi eigi láta verða, ‘presented men with many arguments why that should not be allowed to happen’).

1/7 forn spiðll fira: it is not possible to render adequately this ambiguous, seemingly colloquial phrase.

firar: cognate with fjör, ‘life’, in different poetic contexts (it is not used in prose) refers to (a) men (e.g. Háv 26, Fáf 2); (b) gods (e.g. Lks 25); (c) a god and a man together (e.g. Þórr and Þjálfi, Þórsdr 10); (d) loosely, in the phrase rpk fira, to (anthropomorphic) beings in general, gods, giants, elves, dwarfs, men (e.g. Alv 9, 11, etc.), as well as (e) to the uncertain category of the swan maiden (see commentary to Vkv 2/3). The phrase með firom, ‘among men’, appears to be used in the general sense ‘in the world (in which men live)’ in Skm 27, Vafþ 44, as in OS and OHG (cf. Wessobrunn Prayer 1). A general sense ‘of the (living) world’ would fit well enough also for fira in Alv and Vkv, (d) and (e) above. I have therefore rendered fira in Vsp 1/7 as ‘the world’s’, to embrace, without specifying, giants, gods, dwarfs, men, wild life, and monsters.

spiðll signifies ‘things told’: reports of happenings, news, information (cf. Ghv 9: Gekk hón . . . at telia . . . móðug spiðll, ‘She went to relate grievous tales (of what had happened in her life)’; HH I 36: Fátt mantu, fylkir, / fornra spialla, / er þú þóðlingom / ósǫnno bregðr, ‘You remember few of the facts reported from the past, when you accuse noblemen of what is not true’; HHv 31: Hvat kantu segia / nýra spialla / ór Nóregi? ‘What fresh news from Norway have you to tell?’ (cf. Beowulf 2898); Guð II 5: Gekk ek grátandi / við Grana ræða, / . . . ió frá ek spialla, ‘I went weeping to talk with Grani, . . . I asked the horse what he could tell me [of Sigurðr’s fate]’).

forn signifies ‘from past times’. When Christianity becomes the new, modern religion, forn signifies the old heathenism: forn siðr. At the opening of the poem Óðinn has asked (we are told) for a recital of the past history of the world, forn spiðll. At the centre of the poem (29), he bribes a vplva to see into the future. He is then given spiðll spaklig, ‘wise, i.e. far-sighted, information’ about the future (see commentary to 29/3). The two occurrences of spiðll balance each other, marking the structure of the poem, the change of concern from the old past to the new future. When the Æsir reassemble on the new earth (57), they recall the fornar rúnar, ‘heathen wisdoms of the past’, which Óðinn possessed. From which—are we meant to understand?—the new wisdom came (for forn, ‘heathen’, see Fritzner s.v. § 5).

Behind the phrase forn spiðll fira there lies also the fact that the vplva will be recounting the ‘old tales of men, i.e. that men have told before’—as the poet well knew, because those tales were his source. But in the context, this interpretation remains as an ironic truth in the background, since the vplva makes it quite plain in stanza 2 that she speaks from superhuman knowledge, telling of what men could not know. The poet has chosen the phrase for more than one relevant sense.

1/8 fremst um man: fremst, ‘furthest back in time’, relates to fram in its sense ‘far into the past’ (cf. Íslb 4: at ætlun ok tǫlu . . . Þorkels . . . es langt munði fram, ‘according to the opinion and reckoning of Þorkell who remembered far back into the past’). Compare Óðinn’s request to Vafþrúðnir to tell his earliest memories and knowledge: hvat þú fyrst mant / eða fremst um veitst, Vafþ 34.

2/4 fædda: fem. acc. sg., the first indication that the speaker is female. I take the sense to be ‘fostered’, ‘reared’, rather than ‘begotten’, ‘given birth to’, since the subject is plural.

2/5–8 This coherent picture of the structure of the underworld has no exact parallel in any Norse text. The various elements appear diversely elsewhere; the poet has drawn them succinctly together.

2/5 Nío heima has its analogue in Vafþ 43: Nío kom ek heima / fyr Niflhel neðan; / hinig deyaia ór helio halir, ‘I have come through the nine worlds down to (? below) Niflhel; into those worlds men die from Hel (? i.e. from the grave)’ (see commentary to Skm 35/3). Though here the geography of Niflhel and Hel is not clear to us, the ‘nine realms’ must be realms of the dead; from these Vafþrúðnir the giant gets his wisdom, and into these Þórr takes his nine dying steps (53/9).

2/6–7 nío íviðjur, / miðtvið mæran: Hyndl 35 tells the sacred mystery of einn . . . rǫgna kindar, ‘one of the race of the divine powers’ to whom nine giant girls—íptna meyar—gave birth. In the two lines of the (otherwise lost) Heimdallargaldr, ‘Incantation of Heimdallr’, that Snorri cites (SnE 33), Heimdallr declares himself to be the son of nine mothers, all sisters. These must be the nine giant girls of Hyndl 35. As Heimdallr is the world tree, these mothers must be his roots (well expressed as ‘sisters’). The nine names attributed to the giant girls in Hyndl 36 contain no elements relating to trees or roots; it does not seem, therefore, that the tradition behind Hyndl 35–6 was much concerned with their physical image; their names are giantess names, no more. But the physical image of a tree growing out of a giantess’s body is preserved in a curse—an area of expression where the grotesque is in its element—in HHv 16: the giantess Hrimgerðr is cursed into the earth, Nío rǫstom / er þú skyldir neðarr vera, / ok vaxi þér á baðmi barr! ‘Nine miles deeper down you should be, and may a tree (lit. pine needle) grow on your bosom!’ The same image, in a sublimer form, is probably to be seen in Egill’s description of his son as the kynviðr kváunar minnar, ‘the tree of the kyn of my wife’, where kyn can be both ‘family’ and ‘sex’, ‘womanhood’ (Sonat 21, in a context of allusion to the world tree, as in Vsp 17, 19).

2/7–8 miptvið... fyr mold neðan: in two Eddic texts the roots of the (world) tree are directly associated with the realm of the dead and with giants. In Grím 31, Yggdrasill has three roots: under one is Hel, under another the frost-giants, under the third mankind. In Skm 35 the tree's roots are below the 'pens of corpses' (see commentary ad loc.) within the giant Hrímgrímnir's domain.

For the nine giantess roots of the world tree the poet uses a rare term for giantess, íviðia, recorded also in Hyndl 48 (where it seems to be synonymous with brúðr iptuns, 'giant's bride', 50), and in a pula of heiti for troll women (Skjald B 1. 659, c 3), and in Forspjallsljóð 1: elr íviðja, 'an íviðja bears offspring' (cf. the numerous offspring of the járnviðja Skaði; see commentary to Vsp 39/2). Whether the poet chose the word because it provided a punning allusion to the viðr, 'tree', of which they are the roots, or whether it was a traditional term for the giantess roots which became used more generally, I do not think we can tell. The formation íviðia, if the sense is 'giantess dwelling, living, in a wood, tree, tree root' is difficult to parallel, as prefix í- usually combines with a noun that has a verbal element (e.g. ibúa, 'inhabitant'). Connection with OE inwilde, adj. 'malicious' (see commentary to Vkv 28/7–8) is hardly probable when the 'glorious' great tree's roots are being described; giantesses are not usually given heiti referring to spiritual faults.

The nine underworlds relate to widespread archaic concepts of layered realms of existence below and above the earth's surface, held together by a single axle, the world tree or pillar. In Eurasian rituals the realms (usually nine or seven) are traversed by the shaman in his trances; they may be symbolized by notches on a single tree, or represented by a sequence of trees, which the shaman must climb (Harva (a), 135–44; Tolley (a), 423, 449 cites instances of the shaman descending to the underworld via the tree roots). The concept of nine heavens in Norse is preserved only in the list of their names in a pula of Himins heiti (Skjald B 1. 671, ff): Niu eru himnar / á hæð talðir, 'Nine are the heavens counted on high'. Remnants of the system of nine layers above the earth and nine below, in which the earth's 'roots' grow above Tartarus, or Niflhel, can be seen in Hesiod, Theogony 722–8 (cf. pp. 359–61). In Hesiod the 'layers' have become distances, measured by time: a nine days' drop from heaven to earth, another nine days from earth to Tartarus.

2/8 fyr mold neðan: I have taken this to mean that the vqlva first knew the world tree only as its roots, before it broke out into the light, but the reference might include more generally all the subterranean world she remembers (nío heima... fyr mold neðan).

3/1 ár var alda: I take ár as adv. and alda as gen. of respect. In HH I 1/1 the same phrase may have been imitated from Vsp or drawn from a common traditional store of narrative openings. I would suppose the interpretation of ár as a noun, 'beginning', offered by LP, Fritzner, to be secondary; it is not supported by texts that can be dated before the 12 c. (cf. Stjórn 122: at morgins ári, and lausavísur attributed to Óláfr helgi and Sneglu-Halli, Skjald A 1. 221: 5/6, 388: 1/5).

3/2 On the relationship of this line to Snorri's variant version, see Vsp Introd III. c. Problem IV (i).

þar er Ymir byggð: þar er, 'when', is probably an old usage (cf. Háv 67: tvau lær hengi / at ins tryggva vinar, / þars ek hafða eitt etit, 'two hams were hanging up at my true friend's house, when I had (just) had one to eat [i.e. and was not hungry]'; also Þórarinn Máhliðingr 1/1, Eyrh 38, Skjald B 1. 105, where the translation should clearly be 'when'). The sense 'when' for þær is common in OE narrative poetry (e.g. Andreas 805, 932, 967).

Ymir: a synthetic life-story of Ymir is narrated by Snorri (SnE 12–16). He combines and elaborates material from Eddic and skaldic sources relating to Ymir and Aurgelmir (the cosmic giant under another name). There is no verse source that describes the origin of Ymir, but Snorri adapts the origin ascribed to Aurgelmir (Vafþ 31), so that Ymir emerges by condensation in the midst of Ginnungagap. We are nowhere told how Ymir begot the giant race attributed to him; Aurgelmir's offspring sprang from his armpit and from the rubbing together of his feet (Vafþ 33). There is no verse source that describes the killing of Ymir, though Egill's image of the roaring sea that drowned his son as the moaning wounds of the giant's neck, presupposes a killing (Sonat 3). We are not told that Aurgelmir was ever killed, nor that the cosmos was made from his body: in all sources it is made from Ymir's (Vafþ 21, Grím 40, 41; in Magnússdrápa 19 Arnórr sees the heaven overhanging human life as 'Ymir's aged skull').

Ymir is the older of the two giant names, being etymologically related to Lat geminus, 'twin', Skr Yama (first mortal to die, who becomes king of the dead, overlord of ancestors; archaic traditions of his twin sister-wife, Yami, on whom he begets mankind, are only fragmentarily preserved; AEW s.v. Ymir; Bhattacharji 48–9, 93–9, 107–8). The concept of an androgynous being, begetting from itself, as Aurgelmir does, is implicit in Gmc Tuisto (Germ ii; AR § 573). Aurgelmir is not a name of IE inheritance, but constructed of Norse elements, meaning, as I would understand them, the 'ocean that roars' (gelmir) round, over, the 'fertile, damp soil' (aurr), i.e. the submarine soil that will emerge as the earth (see commentary to 4/1). The icy origins of Aurgelmir reflect Nordic traditions (see Tolley (a), 69; (c), 74).

Snorri implies, but does not state specifically, that Óðinn and his brothers killed Ymir in order to get rid of the evil race of frost-giants (SnE 13–14), and then made the cosmos from his corpse. No other Norse source offers any reason for the killing, and Snorri was probably inventing here what seemed to him most likely. Ancient analogues would seem to confirm his guess. In the Akkadian Creation Epic, Marduk defeats the attack of his own ancestress, Tiamat the malignant water-mother, and makes earth and sky out of her:

He cast down her carcass to stand upon it . . .
Then the lord paused to view her dead body,
That he might divide the monster and do artful works.
He split her like a shellfish into two parts:
Half of her he set up and ceiled it as sky . . .

(Enūma eliš IV. 104, 135–8)

In the Rig-Veda the gods wish to create an ordered universe, but the demon Vṛtra holds in restraint the necessary elements, the sun and the waters, and must first be killed (RV 149). Indra slays him. In some accounts he is said to have sacrificed him (W. N. Brown 79; Bhattacharji 258; Rig-Veda 1. 32. 1-15). The primordial killing of Ymir may also have been conceived of as a sacrifice, in a religious tradition of origins going back to early Germanic times (Merkelbach 193-5; UD (i), 658-9). It is notable that Egill envisages Ymir's blood coming from his neck, that is, from a sacrificial, rather than a fighting wound.

byggði: the same verb is used of God dwelling in heaven in Elucidarius 471/25: Hvar byggvir guð? (translating Ubi habitat Deus? PL 172, col. 1111). Byggva is rarely, if ever, used absolutely as here, without any reference to place, or the person 'dwelt with'. But, given Ymir's peculiar circumstances, what else can the poet say? He was, no doubt, aware of his anomalous usage. The form of conjunction he has chosen, þar er, with its locative associations, helps to accommodate byggði in the context.

3/3 sandr né sær: for the same alliterative association cf. Háv 53: Lítilla sanda / lítilla sæva / lítill ero geð guma, 'By narrow shores of narrow seas narrow are the minds of men'; Egil 78: Eru þar smáir sandar allt með sæ, 'There there are beaches of fine sand all along the sea-coast'. SN 179 notes the emphasis on sandr as more likely to stem from Icelandic than Norwegian observation; yet the maxim in Háv 53 fits well the self-critical Norway that later produced Brand and Skriket (the analogy of Háv 53 with Disticha Catonis II. 6, suggested by von See (e), 63, does not, I think, offer a correct interpretation of geð in the context; cf. North (b), 42-6).

3/5-6 iqrð... upphiminn: this alliterative pairing is common Gmc (cf. OE eorðe... upheofon; OHG ero... ufhimil; OS erða... uphimil; for illuminating documentation and discussion see Lönnroth (b), 310-27).

3/7 gap var ginnunga: cf. Ginnungagap as a place-name, SnE 12, 14, 15, 22. These references are preceded by the citation of Vsp 3, SnE 11. The name Ghimmedegap occurs in a scholion in a 15 c. MS. of Adam of Bremen IV. xxxviii as the Norsemen's term for the inmane baratrum abyssi in the extreme north.

gap, 'opening', is a place-name element in Norway (e.g. Gapoen for an island in the mouth of a fjord; Rygh xvii. 2 etc.), but not in Iceland (though vb. gapa, 'to gape with open mouth' is common; cf. Skm 28/7).

ginnunga presents a tortuous problem; it has no straightforward linguistic interpretation in terms of ON. I set out some assumptions which I find useful and which the meagre evidence seems to allow:

1. That Vsp 3/7 is based on a reversal of the two components in the mythical place-name Ginnungagap, without influence of other origin: i.e. ginnunga had no meaning or usage in ON that was not ultimately dependent on the place-name (which may have made it easier to reverse).

2. That Ginnungagap is a tautology, comparable to a phrase such as 'the gap of Chaos', in which the associated terms derive from the same root and originally had the same significance, namely, 'wide opening', 'chasm'. If Ginnunga had, like

Chaos, become a specific name for the primordial void and the descriptive element in the name was no longer kept alive by current usage, then 'gap' would act as a gloss for the archaic name.

3. That ginnunga is not in origin an ON word, but a pre-literary borrowing of OHG ginunga, 'hiatus', 'rictus' (of a cavernous opening in the ground—caecus hiatus—or the jaws of a beast or demon) found frequently in glosses (Graff IV. 106-7; Steinmeyer-Sievers II. 395, 416, 427, 452, 453, 471, etc.; AW s.v. ginunga; pl. as well as sg. forms are recorded). I suggest that OHG Ginunga may have been a term for the heathen Gmc Chaos borrowed by the Norsemen together with Muspell (see commentary to Vsp 48/2), with a change of stem from gin- to ginn- by association with ON stem ginn- (see below).

Does the difference of stem preclude the likelihood of a borrowing? Adaptation of foreign names in oral tradition is not always philologically exact. ON has a strong vb. gina, 'to gape wide'. OHG ginunga is derived from vb. ginen, 'to be/gape wide open'; the stem vowel is short; cf. Walde 549, 'n-Praesentien'; also OE ginian and ginung (glossing barritus, garrulitas, morsus, the accompaniments of open jaws; BT Suppl.). In OHG no form ginnunga* is found, the stem with double consonant occurring only in derivatives of ginen with prefixes (e.g. inginnen, 'to make open', 'to cut apart', 'to begin'; biginnen, 'to begin'; biginnunga, 'beginning'). OE has equivalent verbs be-, onginnan; ON does not. The OE adj. ginn, 'spacious' (e.g. geond ginne grund, 'throughout the vast earth', Widsið 51) may be related to the ON, OE prefix gin(n)- which appears from its contexts to have an intensive force, based on ancient connotations of magnitude and power. So in ON ginnheilög and ginnregin (of the gods) and in runic ginoronor, ginarunar (where the stem could be with single n, since double consonants are not usually runically represented; the words are from a 7 c. and an 8 c. inscription on the Stenofta and Björketorp stones in southern Sweden, of Danish origin or influence, where these 'mighty' runes enforce a curse; cf. Jóhannesson (a), 78, 107; Nordisk Kultur VI. 46, 114, 173). So too in OE ginfaest, 'powerfully endowed' (of divine gifts), ginnwised, 'mightily instructed'. There is a clear association of magnitude and magical power in uses of the vb. magna, 'to make greater', 'to imbue with magic power' (see Fritzner s.v.), and of the past part. aukinn, OE ēacen, 'made big with child/with supernatural power' (cf. Vkv 36/2, Hyndl 35/3, 43/3, Beowulf 1621). In 13 c. ON prose texts a vb. ginna, 'to deceive', 'to bewitch', and ginning, 'deception', 'befooling', first appear. De Vries sees the origin of Ginnunga- in this vb., arguing that the magical connotations of ginna point to the essential significance of Ginnungagap, namely, 'primordial realm of space filled with magical powers' ('der mit magischen Kräften erfüllte Urraum', de Vries (a), 65). But, as ginna, with its magical associations, occurs so late in ON record, in contexts of no dignity (and does not occur in any other Gmc language), I think it more probable that in Vsp ginnunga retains its original etymological sense of 'yawning emptiness', from whose unimaginable magnitude the 'magic' of the supernatural powers would emerge.

Of poetic relevance to Vsp 3/7 is the OE phrase gärsecges gin, Exodus 431. The noun gin (or ginn: final nn was often simplified; Sievers-Brunner § 231, 1) occurs nowhere else in OE. It might be identified with ON gin, 'mouth', 'jaws' (cf. Dórsdr 15), or taken as an abstract noun related to adj. ginn, 'wide': so, either 'ocean's gaping jaws, gulf', or 'ocean's vast expanse'. In either case gārsecges gin contributes to the oceanic associations of Ginnungagap (see Vsp Introd 11 ad loc.).

The name Ginnungagap must have been established before Þjóðólfr composed Haustl (c. 900), since he models his phrase ginnunga vé upon it: as Þórr drives his chariot furiously to encounter the giant Hrungrnir, Knóttu þll. . . ginnunga vé brinna, 'All the sanctuaries of the realm of space caught fire', while the ground below was lashed with hail (15/1–4), so violent was Þórr's thunderstorm. I take the vé to be the divine estates and temples of the gods, as we see them in Grím 4–17. They are the habitations of Ginnungagap: where once there was vacuity, the gap, now there are vé. That the vé should be set alight by Þórr's lightning may seem somewhat exaggerated, but so is the comedy of the rest of the poem. For another cosmic happening—but this time not comic—that affects the gods' homes in space, see Vsp 40: the corpse-eating, moon-snatching wolf stains ragna sipt with blood. The interpretation (LP) of ginnunga vé as 'hawk's home' i.e. 'sky' is out of keeping with the poetic idiom of Haustl. Þjóðólfr would seem to have taken ginnunga as a gen.; I have done so too, assuming a pl.

4/1 Burs synir: no other poetic text attributes more than one son directly to Burr. The poet is probably dovetailing two separate traditions here, (a) that Burr was the father of Óðinn (Hyndl 30: Var Baldrs faðir / Burs arfbegi, 'Baldr's father was Burr's heir'; Þorvaldr blönduskáld c. 1100, in a kenning for poetry, using the variant Borr: 'the mead of Óðinn, son of Borr, Búri's heir', SnE 92); and (b) that Óðinn had a brother (or possibly two, cf. his name 'Þriði', though only one is named in early skaldic texts): Vili (Ytal 3/2) or Vili (Sonat 23/2). No poetic text except Vsp identifies the Burs synir with the blíð regin who 'made Miðgarðr' in Grím 41/2–3. Loki gives Frigg, Óðinn's wife, two lovers, Vili and Véi, but does not say that they are Óðinn's brothers (see commentary to Lks 26/4). In poetic tradition (e.g. Vell 4/2) Óðinn has a mother Bestla, 'Tree Bark', whose father was a giant Bölþorn, 'Evil Thorn' (cf. Háv 140; Hunke greatly illuminates this genealogy). Snorri amalgamates all these details, using the synthesis already in Vsp 4: Búri, who was licked from salty ice-rocks by the primordial cow (SnE only), had a son Borr, by no specified means. Borr's wife was Bestla, daughter of Bölþorn. By her Borr had three sons, Óðinn, Vili, and Véi. These sons of Borr kill Ymir and fashion earth and sky from his corpse in the centre of Ginnungagap (SnE 13–14).

The name Burr, 'Born One', 'Son' is fitting for a first-born primordial being (as de Vries notes, AR § 578; cf. the equally simple primordial name Mannus, Germ ii). The form Borr is virtually exclusive to SnE MSS. Elsewhere it is adopted, probably under Snorri's influence, in H 'bors synir', and occurs in one MS. variant, 'borðz [i.e. borz] niðiar' in Egil lausavísa 30 (i.e. Skjald A1. 54, lausavísa 21). Snorri may have adopted Borr to distinguish the name from the common noun burr (for which borr does not appear to be a common variant; but cf. MS. R reading borar Bors in the lines of Þorvaldr blönduskáld, SnE 92, noted above). For the stem vowel variation u/o see Jóhannesson (b) § 99. SN 54 suggests that the Burs synir might be more fittingly interpreted as Óðinn, Hœnir, and Lóðurr, as in Vsp 18, rather than Óðinn, Vili, and Véi, as in SnE. But either attempt at interpretation destroys the poet's deliberate anonymity for these gigantic sons.

4/2 biððom um ypðo: biðð neut. pl. of beð* is a poetic term for 'land', occurring only five times (Víga-Glúm 31, lausavísa 2/8, needs emendation). Moberg, 38–51, notes that the ON instances of biðð in a poetic context all relate to land beside, or rising above, water. In Höfuðlausn 2 Egill is approaching Engla bjöð from the sea; in Kormakr's lausavísa 61, Korm 274, he declares that earth will sink into ocean—bjöð sekkva, / færask fjöll. . . í djúpan ægi—before as lovely a woman as Steingerðr will be born (Kormakr is reversing the raising of biðð in Vsp 4/2 to become part of Ragnarøk, with echoes of the wording and images of Vsp 50/5, 54/2, 56/3); in Merlínusspá II 68/7–8 bloody rivers shall flow down (to the sea) from the higher land—af bjöðum falla. Swedish place-names confirm a sense of 'land, bank, shore, raised beside water'. Etymologically biðð is probably to be related to IE terms for digging (e.g. Lat fodere), by which banks, dikes, are raised.

ypðo signifies both 'lifted up' and 'revealed', 'made known' (Fritzner s.v. yppa §§ 2, 3). Earth is lifted out of obscurity and then (4/4) becomes mæran, 'renowned', 'glorious'.

The legend that earth was raised from a watery void by the sons of a primordial giant is not found elsewhere in ON. The fragmentary records of a sea contest between Heimdalr and Loki for possession of the necklace of the fertility goddess Freyja can, however, be seen as an analogue, couched in symbolic terms, of the freeing of earth from ocean by a benign power (see commentary to Lks 20/1–8). To such a form of the myth there are analogues in Eurasian legend, couched in Christian terms, e.g. in which God orders the Devil to dive into the waters and bring up Earth; the Devil attempts to get possession of Earth, but God outplays him. (Harva (b), ch. 2 cites a fine range of analogues for the raising of earth from ocean in Finno-Ugrian and Siberian legend. Schier (a), 15–42 offers a valuable typological analysis of a far wider range of related legends, which suggests that the motif of diving into the cosmic waters for the earth, by a bird or a deity's helper, was the most archaic; Schier's documentation is a rich guide (42–52). Zimmer emphasizes the cyclic nature of such myths in Indian tradition (18): 'In one of the Purānic accounts of the deeds of Vishnu in his Boar Incarnation or Avatār, occurs a casual reference to the cyclic recurrence of the great moments of myth. The Boar, carrying on his arm the goddess Earth whom he is in the act of rescuing from the depths of the sea, passingly remarks to her: "Every time I carry you this way . . ." Distantly, the Norse poet's myth belongs to the same tradition.) From the dualistic tale of Heimdalr and Loki—diving in the shape of seals (not birds) for the sea-kidney that is earth (Húsdr, SnE 99, 100)—it seems a long step to the quiet scene of the Burr's sons' uncontested raising of earth in Vsp. Imaginative simplification is, however, one of the poet's characteristics. The only text I know of to which his bears a flicker of resemblance is Genesis 1: 9: Dixit vero Deus: Congregentur aquae, quae sub caelo sunt, in locum unum: et appareat arida. Et factum est ita. The Burr's sons too made dry land 'appear', ypðo. I have called them cosmic weightlifters, but in fact the poet has not used a strenuous verb (I do not suggest that he is copying Genesis, only that the likeness illuminates the Norse).

4/6 á salar steina: salr, 'hall', is figuratively used for 'earth' (envisaged as an enclosed dwelling-place; AEW s.v.) also in Pórsdr 7/8, where salþak, 'hall-roof', denotes the sky (see Davidson 597–8). More commonly salr is used of the sky (cf. Alv 12/6, HH I 3/7). The earth newly raised from sea for the first time, is barren rocks: a natural concept in Iceland or Norway. The second coming of earth out of ocean 'green again' (56/4) is un-, or super-, natural.

4/8 lauki: no doubt a symbolic use of 'leek' to convey the rich growth of the first earth, taller and more glorious than grass (cf. Guð II 2: Svá var Sigurðr / uf sonom Giúka, / sem væri grænn laukr / ór grasi vaxinn, 'Sigurðr towered over the sons of Giúki like a green leek springing up from the grass'). Gras in the last line of Vsp 3 is deliberately contrasted with grænom lauki in the last line of Vsp 4 to make explicit the physical progress time and the sun have caused. In later colloquial usage laukr might refer to a variety of plants, including grass, in Iceland and on the mainland; it is improbable that the poet intended laukr to signify no more than grass here (see Heizmann (a), 71–5 for fine discussion; AR § 199). For the felicitous connotations of grænn see commentary to Ríg 1/2.

5/1–4 I interpret these lines in the light of Vafþ 23, taking hverfa, 23/4, as causative: himin hverfa / þau skolo, 'they (Sun and Moon) must make the heaven turn' (cf. Fritzner s.v. hverfa, vb. (fð) §§ 2, 4). The heaven itself may 'turn' (cf. Heiðarvíga Saga 313: himinn hverfr), but there is no parallel for intransitive vb. hverfa (hvarf), 'to move (across the heaven)', without a prepositional phrase (cf. Grim 27/8). The name of the father of Sun and Moon, Mundilfæri, occurs only in Vafþ 23 and in SnE 17 (taken from Vafþ), with MSS. variants to the second element -færi, -feri, -fari which suggest 'bearing', 'moving', or a device for bearing or moving. Mundil- is commonly taken to be from mund neut., 'point of time', and to be a reference to the prompt time-keeping of the moon (LP). Mund, 'time', is not found in verse, however, and may not have been part of ancient vocabulary. Mund fem., 'hand', might be a better alternative (cf. Lat manus). Vigfússon s.v. Mundilfæri suggests that the name is 'akin to möndull [handle for turning a handmill], referring to the veering round or revolution of the heavens'. Möndull (cf. HH II 3, 4, Grott 20) is thought to be related to Skr manthati, 'to stir, turn round', manthá- 'stirring spoon' (AEW s.v.), but there are no related verbs in Gmc, even though variants of möndull (and possibly mundill) are found in all the Scandinavian languages. If Mundilfæri did mean 'Carrier of the Mill-Handle', he would be the upper millstone itself, which 'carries' the möndull/mundill (fitted into a slot in the stone) and is turned by it. His two children might operate the handle together, as do Fenja and Menja (cf. Grott 23). I would relate the statements in Vsp 5/1–4 and Vafþ 23 to the archaic concept of the cosmic mill, by which the heavens turn on the world pillar, regulating seasons and time, and I would suppose that the lost lines 5/5–8 had made this theme clearer. Since Vigfússon's wise insight, we now have an incisive analysis of comparative mythological material on the theme of the cosmic mill in ON, Finnic, and Indian by Tolley (c). The material bears the stamp of different cultures and eras and artistic intentions, but the central parallels, that Tolley undogmatically presents, are most impressive (see esp. 75–6).

5/5–10 I take these lines to be interpolated (see Vsp Introd II ad loc.).

máni . . . megins: cf. ME Pearl 1093: þe maynful mone.

6/1–4 The gods assemble in council in BDr 1, Prym 14 (in identical phrasing: Senn vóru æsir / allir á þingi, / ok ásynior / allar á máli, 'At once the Æsir were all in council and the Ásynior all talking'), and in Haustl 10 (gættusk allar áttir / Ingvifreys at þingi, 'all the kinsmen of Ingvifreyr took counsel in assembly'). In each of these cases the þing is held because of some fearful happening: Baldr has had dreams of death; Þórr's hammer has been stolen; the gods are growing old because Iðunn has been abducted. But in Vsp 6 there is no fear, no dilemma confronts the gods' sacred power; the human term þing is not used, the thrones relate to no mortal office. Of the instances of the 'gods-in-assembly' motif in ON verse (including the other instances in Vsp itself, 9, 23, 25, 49) Vsp 6/1–4 is unique in its serenity.

6/1 regin: related to terms of 'ruling', 'judgement' (cf. Gothic ragin, 'counsel, judgement', raginon, 'to be a governor'); in ON only used of divine or supernatural sovereignty (as an intensive prefix see Hamð 25/2).

6/2 røkstóla: see Vsp Introd II ad loc. For the implications of røk see LP s. vv. røk, rekja.

6/3 ginnheilog: see under ginnunga 3/7.

6/4 um þat I take to refer to the new development of the revolving heaven in the preceding stanza. There is no reason to suppose that an indirect question has been lost to which þat relates (as in 9/5, 23/5, 25/5), as SN suggests (no indirect question follows Haustl 10).

6/5 niðiom: ON poetic texts do not give more than fragments of the genealogy of Night and Day. In Vafþ 25/3, Alv 29/5 Night is the daughter of Nǫrr; in Vafþ 25/1–2 Day is the son of Delligr. Snorri makes Day the son of Night and Delligr, but there is no other extant source for this (SnE 17). In Vafþ 27 Winter and Summer have fathers. Tacitus notes that among the Germani night is regarded as ushering in day (nox ducere diem videtur, Germ xi). In Hesiod, Theogony 123–4, Night, child of Chaos, was mother of Day. Vafþ 25/4–6: ný ok nið / skópo nýt regin refers to the creation of a lunar programme, rather than of entities (though Nýi and Niði become personified, like Norðri and Suðri, as dwarfs; Vsp 11/1–2).

6/6 ngfn um gáfo: the giving of names in the early world is often a divine prerogative and the accompaniment of creation (see Pritchard 68–9, Tablet VI; U. and P. Dronke 162–5).

6/9 undorn: the time between midday and the ninth hour (3 p.m.), replaced in the 11 c. by the Christian term nón. Later ON undorn, like its Gmc parallels, refers to the morning interval from the third hour till noon (see Vigfússon s.v. Etymologically undorn is related to Lat interim; AEW s.v.). An old place-name Undunfell (from Undornfell*) in southern Vatnsdalr marks the position of the afternoon sun for the farm that lies north-east of it (B. M. Olsen (a); Vatnsdæla Saga 72, n. 2; Landn 223).

6/10 árom at telia: lit. 'to reckon in years [the passing of the hours]'. For the awareness in Iceland of the importance for accurate chronology of the observation of each day's progress see Íslb 9, ch. 4.

7/1 æsir: the descendant of an ancient Gmc name, Ansis, first described by the Goth Jordanes (Getica p. 76, line 13; AD 551) as a name of honour signifying demigods, given by the Goths to their leaders (non puros homines, sed semideos, id est Ansís) 'by whose fortuna it seemed' (quorum quasi fortuna) the Goths had won a great victory over the Romans on the Danube (in the time of Domitian, AD 81–96). To the people it appeared that these leaders had shown themselves to be possessed of luck, which came from the gods, and after their death they would join the gods and be worshipped with them, continuing to give their luck to their people (as did the heathen King Eiríkr of Sweden, who was later made a saint; Rimbert, Vita Anskarii 62; AR §§ 312, 322). If the æsir were in origin great men deified in their lives and after death, this would throw light on their traditional association with the álfar, who were identified with the spirits of beneficent ancestors (see commentary to Vsp 49/1–2).

The etymology of Ansis/æsir is disputed (AR § 346; AEW s.v. áss 1; IEW 25–6; for a valuable summary of the scholarship on the etymology of ansuz*, see Polomé). I would (with Meringer 159–60) relate áss, 'god', to áss, 'strong beam of timber', 'ridge-beam of a roof' (also of an undetermined etymology), because (a) this would relate áss, 'god', to a known concept of deity as a support, for the cosmos and for men, in the form of a tree or pillar (as in Heimdallr, Irmisul, Þórr's gndvegissúla), and (b) a comparable name is recorded by Dio Cassius (LXXII. 12. 1), writing c. AD 220 for a legendary Vandal leader, of the Hasdingi tribe, Raptos (i.e. 'rafter', ON raptir); he was partnered by a brother, Raos (i.e. 'reed', ON reyr, or 'thin tree-trunk'; AR § 499). Polomé's suggestion (43–4) that ansuz* is a term closely linked in ancient IE religious vocabulary with the concept of 'magic bond' would fit well with the association of 'bonds' with the divine tree or pillar (see UD (i), 666 and 657–8), and so with áss, 'timber beam', etymologically. The evidence of runic inscriptions and personal names in documents shows that ans- (OE ōs) was a familiar element in the Gmc tongues from at least the fifth century.

7/2 Íðavelli: I have assumed that the name of the plain refers to the cyclic ebb and flow of the world (and its gods), a perpetually returning cosmos, relating Íða- to íða fem., 'eddy' (though the compound form is difficult to parallel), and thus to the same stem as Íðunn, goddess of renewal (see commentary to Lks 17/4–6); cf. Lat iterum, 'again', OE prefix ed- as in edwenden, 'turning again', ednīwe, 'new again'.

Íðavöllr will return after Ragnarøk (57), as will the golden chess pieces (58), and indeed the æsir themselves. There is also no doubt a pun implied in Íða- on the industrious activity of the gods, their íðja and íðn. The suggestion (SN) that íða- implies the evergreenness of this völlr, growing every year unsown, is not appropriate after 4/7–8, or before 59/1–2.

7/3–4 þeir — hátimbroðo: that gods should build their own temples would seem to be a very ancient motif (as in the Akkadian Creation Epic, Pritchard 68, lines 51–72). The poet of Vsp is clearly influenced by Grim 5, 6, 12, 16, where some of the gods are said to have built their own dwellings. The vb. hátimbra occurs only in Vsp and Grim 16, where Niðrðr 'lord of men . . . rules the high-built shrine' (hátimbroðom horgi ræðr).

horg ok hof: cf. Vafþ 38: hofom ok horgom; HHv 4: Hofmun ek kíosa, / horga marga. For a most helpful discussion of the distinctions that the extant sources suggest between these two places of heathen worship, see E. O. G. Turville-Petre 239–43. Horgr has associations with worship in the open; its equivalents OE hearg, OHG harug, had the meaning 'grove' as well as 'temple', and horgr may originally have denoted an uncovered sacrificial altar, built of stones (cf. Hyndl 10), and only later a roofed building, like hof. The term hærgtrafum in Beowulf 175 implies a timber-built temple (cf. wearhtreafum, 'house of the damned'; Elene 926), as does also, no doubt, the vb. hátimbroðo, Vsp 7/4. See also AR §§ 266–9.

7/5–8 Afla — gorrðo: the scene of the gods forging their own wealth is designed to anticipate the creation of the dwarfs (9). No source independent of Vsp represents the Norse gods as a community of smiths (though semi-divine legendary communities of metal-working smiths are well known from elsewhere; Eliade (b), 106–7; Der kleine Pauly s.v. Kabeiroi). The gods are fashioning the abstract auðr with their concrete tongs and anvils, because Auðr, in myth, is the 'richness' of his sister, Jörð, the earth (on the text of Hákonardrápa here see Davidson ad loc.; SnE 115 line 23; AR § 311). The scene is succinctly symbolic and prepares us for the gods' wealth of gold in the following stanza.

8 Van Hamel points the way to the interpretation of this stanza. His documentation, and that of de Vries, AR § 299, provide the most significant evidence:

1. In choosing the game of tafl as the first conflict in the gods' career, the poet draws on older tradition that represents the antagonism of gods and giants as a contest of tafl. The fragment of evidence for this lies in the answer to one of the 'Riddles of Heiðrekr' (Heiðr 37, v. 55; Fas 1. 219): 'Who are the thanes who . . . send their liegemen over the lands to settle in homesteads?' 'These are Ítrekr and Andaðr, sitting at their tafl game' (MSS. R, U), 'That is the tafl game of Ítrekr' (MS. H). In Pulur IV e Ítreks jóð i.e. 'offspring' are listed as 'Óðinn's sons' (burir Óðins); in Pulur IV b 4 Andaðr is a giant-heiti. Óðinn-Ítrekr (? 'Glorious Leader') contends with Andaðr ('Dead One') in a perpetual match of alternate winning and losing. In Vsp the first end-game will be Ragnarøk, the second, Baldr's return. In stanza 8, however, the poet has not wished to reach Ragnarøk yet, only to strike the distant sound of it. He has therefore made the challenge less formidable than Death, and chosen a variant with three giant girl players, based, no doubt, on a legend, or type of legend, already well known—since otherwise he could hardly have alluded so cryptically to it and expected his audience to follow him on the stepping-stones of his text.

2. The evidence for the legend of the three pursa meyar, other than Vsp 8, is, however, very slight. While there are tales of supernatural beings and witches who challenge a hero at a board-game for a high stake, sometimes in a series of three or even more games (as Midir plays Eochaid for his wife Etain, in the Courtship of Etain 30), I know of no instance of three such challengers coming as a team. Van Hamel 227 suggests that they stole the tafl board and pieces. One short episode in Egils Saga einhenda 177–8, ch. 13 (van Hamel 231) could be a reminiscence of such a theft story: three huge women, i.e. giantesses, own a miraculous tafl set, which plays of its own accord against any player. Did they steal it? For this there is no evidence, but when it is stolen from them, they fight furiously to keep it. The theft motif might have become misplaced in popular use of the story.

There is nothing furtive, however, about the giant girls' coming in Vsp. They come patently for confrontation—ámáttkar miðk—not (I suggest) to steal the tafl set, but to challenge the gods to play them for it. They want to get control of the mechanism of the gods' prosperity, just as, later (25), the giant builder wants to get the world's life—the sun, the moon, and Freyja—out of the gods' hands by a deceptive bargain. The gods will never (I suppose) have lost a tafl game, except to themselves (see 3. below). They will have regarded their tafl board as one whose owner always wins (like those in hygisögur; van Hamel 231). So, in total self-confidence, the gods will accept the girls' challenge. And now, to find themselves losing to outsiders—female giants—will be a shock to them such as they have never yet experienced, bringing, no doubt, furious resentment and dispute. At the last minute, on the brink of losing the game (I suggest), the gods will smash their tafl board rather than surrender it—as Arthur crushes the golden pieces in his hand, when he sees the game going against him (Dream of Rhonabwy 150; van Hamel 236), and Peredur throws the chessboard into the lake, when his favoured side is losing (Peredur 224; more tafl quarrels are cited by van Hamel 230).

3. In human affairs, it would seem, the board-game was believed to have a remote control over happenings. In the fiction of the Dream of Rhonabwy the fighting between Arthur's young knights and Owein's ravens is governed by the chess play of each leader. In a story preserved in Gmc historical tradition (Paulus Diaconus i. xx) Rodulfus, king of the Heroli (c. 500) stays in his camp during a battle and ad tabulam ludit. A watchman reports to him on the distant battle from a treetop (messengers report also to Arthur and Owein). Though for the Heroli the battle was disastrous, it would seem that Rodulfus had played a ritual game on their behalf (as de Vries, AR § 299, notes). The tafl the gods play in Vsp 8 is their ritual game to maintain the golden fortunes of the world through the movement of the celestial bodies over the heavens. As Needham points out (248): 'The game of chess, as we know it, has been associated throughout its development with astronomical symbolism, and this was even more overt in related games now long obsolete [my italics]. Investigation shows that the battle element of chess seems to have developed from a technique of divination in which the Chinese desired to ascertain the balance of ever-contending Yin and Yang forces in the universe. This was in use in +6th-century China, whence it passed to +7th-century India to generate the recreational game. This 'image-chess' (hsiang chhi) derived in its turn from a number of divination-techniques which involved the throwing of small models, symbolic of the celestial bodies, on to prepared boards. There were also intermediate forms between pure casting, and casting followed by combat moves.' I cite this passage because it illuminates in ON the symbolic link between tafl and the world's fortune, the contending of Ítrekr and Andaðr at tafl, and the association of throwing dice with tafl (so re-enacting, as it were, the element of chance in the world's fortune; in many Norse graves dice are found with tafl boards and pieces; Eldjárn 358–61; see also Page (b), 163–4). For the association of gaming-board, heavens, and divine power, see Blathmac (c. 750) 65, quatrain 192: 'He [Christ] owns the extent that he marks out of the seven heavens about the kingly seat; it is his hand that has strewn in them the gaming-board of beautiful stars'. Carney notes that the Ballincherry board has seven rows of seven holes, and the central hole ringed for the 'king' (Blathmac 146).

In the realm of mythology the tafl game, symbolizing the moving cosmos, is a variant of the cosmic mill, whose turning can bring good or evil fortune (cf. Grott). Their legends present variations on the myth of the golden age and its loss. The Finnish myth of the shattering of the prosperity-bringing sampo provides a vivid parallel (see Tolley (c), 63–7).

8/1 teflðo í túni: in Haraldskvæði 16 the warriors throw dice í Haralds túni (i.e. in the enclosed home-field, which had fine, manured grass).

8/3 vettergis: adverbial gen. of vætrr, 'thing', with negative suffix -gi, with addition of gen. -s of masc. sg. (though vætrr is fem.), with shortening of æ to e in a trisyllable or before consonant groups (Noreen § 476. 3).

8/7 ámáttkar miðk: from ámáttigr, a term used of powerful, imposing, and potentially menacing figures, such as giants (cf. Skm 10/8) and occasionally warriors (HHv 14/2; cf. ámáttigr, used of a transvestite valkyrie HH I 38/3).

9/5 hvárt: see Vsp Introd III c. Problem II (i) (b).

9/7 ór Brimis blóði: since the blood of Ymir formed the ocean (Vafþ 21/6), the old giant may well be called 'Ocean Wave' (brim, 'surging wave', of sea breaking against land, a term steadily in practical use, e.g. in the Frostapings laws; see brim-compounds in Vigfússon, Fritzner). Brimir occurs in Vsp 36 (see commentary ad loc.) as another name for Ægir ('Ocean Giant'), who brews ale for the gods (Hym I, 3; AEW s.v. ægir). What connection Ocean-Brimir has with Brimis eggjar, Sigrdr 14/2, we do not yet know.

9/8 ór Bláins leggiom: Bláinn, 'Blue/Black One', must be another name for Ymir, referring no doubt to his dark and deadly flesh from which the earth was made (Vafþ 21/1–2; cf. Flosi's wrathful complexion stundum blár sem hel, Njál 292). That the dwarfs are to be made from Bláinn's 'limbs' would suggest that they are to be made out of stone or rock, since the 'limb of earth' is a rocky mountain (cf. Húsdr 5: fróns (earth's) leggs (limb's) folk (people) 'people of the mountain', 'giants' (see SnE 168; AR § 181).

10 – 16 As these stanzas cannot be an original part of Vsp (see Vsp Introd III c. Problem II (i) (b)), I have not given space to a commentary for them. I do not think that material in these stanzas can be made relevant to Vsp 8 and 17 as Steinsland (b), 82–3, suggests. I have rendered the dwarf-names according to LP and SG for the most part (but preferring, for example, to relate Fili to fill, 'elephant', rather than a by-form of fél, 'file'). For the most recent learned and imaginative work on the names and traditions of dwarfs in ON see the articles of Motz, (a), (c), and (g), and her book, (d). Most remarkable in the dwarf material preserved in Vsp are the allusions to their history as a people, their descent from 'Lofarr', their migration from rocky land to fertile plains (so it would seem; 14), and to the undying fame of their names (16). See also commentary to Vsp 36/4.

17/2 ór því liði: probably því is a corrupt reading. Priðia might be a possible correction, 'from Priði's (Óðinn's) host', emphasizing the number of times in legend that Óðinn has two companions (cf. Haustl and prologue to Reg; AR § 399). The possibility of interpreting liði/liði as 'ship' (see LP s.vv. 2) with reference to Skíðblaðnir, which could accommodate all the Æsir (SnE 48), occurs to me, but I can see no arguments in favour of it.

qflgir: the only other áss to be called qflugr is Heimdallr, when, as Rígr, he strides on his green way (Ríg 1/3), and, as Loki's opponent, he takes possession, móðqflugr, 'strong in daring', of the 'gleaming sea-kidney', the jewel of earth (Húsdr 2).

ástgir: hap. leg. Elsewhere terms in ást- are used of personal relationships (e.g. Sonat 7: ástvinir, 'dear friends'; Sigrdr 21/4: ástráð, 'loving counsels'; cf. Hym 4/7) or of Christian love, but not of the Norse deities' attitude to mankind.

17/4–8 at húsi: a deliberate echo, I suggest, of Ríg 2/3 (or its source) kom hann at húsi. Proleptically hús here stands for the earth that is about to be dwelt in.

á landi: the Æsir find Askr and Embla on land, on the sea-shore, that is, because the model or mythologem underlying the scene is that of the coming of the divine driftwood—like Þórr's hall-pillar—over the sea to inaugurate the habitation of the new land (see UD (i), 680–1). So strong is the association of driftwood from the sea with the propagation of man on the earth, that in the prose preface to Ríg the god is said to stride first along a sea-shore before he comes at húsi—where he finds Ái and Edda, a variant of Askr and Embla, quite as ørloglaus without divine help as they.

Ask ok Embla: while in Vsp the mythologem to which Askr and Embla primarily relate—á landi—is that of the divine driftwood, the fact that here there are two wooden figures links them to a second mythologem, that of the god as kindler of life between male and female, made of wood. In archaic fire-making rituals fire is sparked by boring with a hard spike of wood into a softer wooden block: a simulation of sexual action, in which the spark of life is given by the god. The ritual symbolizes and celebrates the restoration of life and fertility, after death, after winter, and is associated with sun-cults of the Bronze Age (see AR § 84 on the carving of such a ritual, with elaborate ceremonies, on the Kivik Stone, Skåne). Is Embla, however, a tree-name, like Askr? The evidence seems reasonably good: a fem. diminutive of almr, 'elm', might develop from Almilon* > Elmla* > Emla* (by consonant simplification) > Embla* (by introduction of a glide consonant, as in Auðumbla, MS. variant of Auðumla, SnE 13; see also Pipping II. 40–2. Embila is recorded as a woman's name in 11 c. Germany; Förstemann s.v.). From the Bronze Age also come finds in Denmark and Norway of phallic cult-figures made from fortuitously shaped branches, finished by carving, which may illustrate for us the concept of Askr, god or man, as driftwood (AR § 83).

There is yet one more tradition that may have contributed to the establishment of Askr and Embla as the primordial pair of humans. The ritual of fire-making is associated with twin-brother cults, whose symbol, two wooden pillars erect, on which a beam rests horizontally, closely resembles, and is no doubt intended to represent the apparatus for creating (the Promethean) fire (AR § 499, Fig. 22). Brother pairs appear as the earliest leaders of some Gmc tribes, e.g. Raptos and Raos (see commentary to 7/1), and Amri and Assi of the Vandals (Origo Gentis Langobardorum 34; Paulus Diaconus I. viii; AR § 369). The names of these brothers relate to timber or trees, Assi and Ambri being 'Ash' and 'Elm'. I would not dismiss the likelihood (as de Vries does, AR § 578, n. 5) that the name pairs Assi and Ambri, Askr and Embla are connected by a remote falling together of traditions. Both name pairs stand at the head of a 'genealogical' tradition, the first known names of a tribe, and of human kind. (I have no parallel for the conversion of a Gmc masc. name into a fem. (if that is indeed what happened to Ambri), but the existence of pairs in Gmc (Nerthus/Njörðr, Fjörgyn/Fjörgynn) suggests that such a conversion would present no problem.) In OE Æsc is a founder of a royal house, the Æscingas of Kent (improbably made the son of Hengist; ASC s.a. 455 ff.; Bede II. 5 however has the forms Oisc, Oiscingas). For a more ancient tradition that a generation of men were sprung from ash-trees, see Hesiod, Works and Days 143–4. It seems very probable that the names of the first man and woman in Vsp and in Ríg begin by design with the same initials as Adam and Eve; but at what moment this idea occurred I would not venture to suggest.

ørloglaus: masc. acc. pl., where neut. would be expected, but cf. Helr 14/2–3: konor ok karlar / kvikvir fæðaz (DH cite several instances).

18/1–2 Qnd . . . óð: I take qnd to be the breathing spirit of animation in the body which dies when the body dies (cf. andask, 'to expire'; andaðr, 'having breathed', 'dead'), and óðr to be the spirit of the mind, or soul, which does not die, but is continually renewed in another life (if the proper sacrifices are performed; see commentary on Hæfir 60/1). For the appropriateness of gnd as the gift of Óðinn, see commentary on Yggdrasill 19/2.

18/3 lá: lit. 'the line of shoal water along the shore, edged by the surf' (Vigfússon s.v.); used generally in skaldic verse for 'liquid', of poetry (Húsdr 1, Vell 2) and of blood (Hákonarmál 8: oddláar, 'weapon-point shallows'). In ModÍcel lá also has the sense 'film, skin on the surface of water' (Blöndal s.v. 4; synonymous with brá, brák, skán, cf. Böðvarsson s.vv.). There is only one ON text I know where lá is used of a human physical feature, a lausavísa of Kormakr (Korm 211, 6/4); here lá appears to refer to Kormakr's skin: it is pale, sallow, lá splva (acc.), and his lady thinks he is allfplr, 'extremely pallid'. In the introductory portrait of Kormakr (Korm 206) he is described as black-haired and hgrundljóss, 'light of complexion (flesh-covering)'. Might hgrundljóss be a flattering rendering of lá splva and allfplr? I suggest that Vsp lá might similarly refer to the covering, mantle, of flesh with which Lóðurr clothes the wooden bodies of Askr and Embla. Compared with the wood it would be a moist covering, pulsing with the stream of blood, so that both aspects of lá (moving, tidal, liquid and mantled, still, covering over liquid) could be considered contextually relevant. Among the heiti in Skáldskaparmál (SnE 191) is lá for 'hair' (Hár heitir lá), which seems to have little relationship with other known senses of lá. I suspect it is Snorri's guess at the meaning of lá in Vsp, though it is not a meaning he gives in his paraphrase of the stanza (SnE 16). In the case of so brief a word, which could have arisen from various alternative contractions, etymology is not a sure guide in the search for meaning (see e.g. SG ad loc.). A relationship between lá in Korm, Vsp, and lag, 'layer', and other derivatives of liggja, if it could be argued, would be attractive, nevertheless. For a possible echo of Vsp elsewhere in Korm see commentary to 4/2.

læti covers aspects of behaviour ('expression', 'manners', 'bearing') as well as 'voice', 'utterance'. The poet may wish to imply all these human attributes here (even though in Grip 39/2 læti expressly does not include 'speech'; SG).

18/4 lito góða: litr, 'colour', may imply more generally 'appearance', 'looks'; here it is probably also used symbolically for the living viriditas of the newly breathing twigs. I do not think it possible to read góða, 'of the gods', rather than góða, 'good', taking the phrase as an allusion (not necessarily Christian) to the creation of man in the image of God (Steinsland (b), 87 and n. 6). The relationship of man to god is well expressed in the identification of the two names Askr (17, 19), a mystical identification, that has little to do with the human physical implications of lito. The Norse gods, with their marked eccentricities, do not present a coherent image for copying, either physically or spiritually.

18/5–8 The three Æsir come like fairy godmothers with fortunate gifts for the new born infants (cf. the benign norns in HH I 2–4). De Vries (b), 34–5 (citing von der Leyen 123) summarizes an Indian analogue, a folk-tale in which four—or in some versions three—travellers of different callings create a woman, and then debate whose wife she should be: the woodcarver carves her of sandalwood, the weaver clothes her, the goldsmith adorns her, the priest, with a magic formula, gives her life. This tale illuminates, I think, the kind of story pattern influencing the poet here, though, as de Vries notes, the poet's 'main interest is for the psychical constitution of the human kind' rather than the material (as in the folk-tale). The poet was no doubt also familiar with legends of animated trémenn, clothed into valorous humanity by Óðinn, as in Háv 49 (see the thorough analysis of this motif by North (a), 238–75, 'Woden worhte weos'; also SN commentary to 17/8; Steinsland (b), 100–4).

18/7 Lóðurr: almost certainly a third name of Loki/Loptr (cf. Lks 19). If that is so, we have the same trio of gods, Óðinn, Hæfir, Loki, in Vsp as appears in Haustl (c. 900) to open the tale of the abduction of Iðunn, and in the prose prologue to Reg to open the tale of the killing of 'Otter' and the origin of the dragon hoard. While we cannot give an early date to the Reg prologue, it confirms that the initial trio was a familiar tradition, perhaps a conventional mise en scène for tales of Loki's ill-timed actions. Eyvindr denotes Óðinn as vinr Lóðurs, 'Lóðurr's friend' (Hál 9, c. 985). The 'friendship' of the trio is underlined when in Haustl Loki is twice called vinr Hæfis (3, 7) and Hæfir is called vinr hrafnásar (4; i.e. of Óðinn the Raven God), and in Vell 12 Óðinn is called Lopts vinr (see Davidson 122–3, 276–8). Snorri does not record the name Lóðurr in SnE; he may not have been sure of his identity, even though he cites Hál 9 in Hér I. 108.

The meaning of Lóðurr (rhymed with glóði by Haukr Valdísarson, Íslendinga-drápa 1/1, in the 12 c.) is difficult to determine, no doubt because it is of ancient origin. If it is related to lóð, 'vegetation', 'growth that covers the earth', it would be a fitting name for Loki in his creative role in Vsp 18, clothing the human twigs with an attractive physical exterior, as lóð can clothe the earth (cf. the pointed allusion to Loki's name Loptr in 25/5). On the possibility of a connection between Lóðurr and a fertility goddess Loðkona*, see McTurk (b), 37–9, developing Sahlgren; AR §§ 511, 560.

19/2 Yggdrasill: the nom. form only occurs here (cf. Yggdrasils askr, 45/9–10). Yggr, 'Terrible One', is an Óðinn-name (Grim 53/2), drasill a poetic term for 'horse', so 'Óðinn-Horse'. This name must relate to sacrificial practice that goes back to ancient IE tradition. In Adam of Bremen iv. xxvii the sacrifice practised at Uppsala every nine years is described, in which the bodies of men, dogs, and horses are hung on the trees in the temple grove, and the trees are considered to be divine 'because of the death or putrefaction of the victims'. Though the sacrifice and veneration of horses is well attested in Gmc lands (AR § 258), the only recorded instance of the sacrifice of a horse on a tree is that at Uppsala. As de Vries notes, the archaic practice of horse sacrifice is most sharply illuminated by Indian religious texts. I set out briefly the most relevant points of interest for Yggdrasill:

1. Drasill, 'horse', relates etymologically to OHG drāson, drāsjan, 'to snort, breathe heavily, puff and blow'. In a 10 c. text of Virgil, Georgics III. 85, the gloss drāsot is written over volvit, 'exhales' (Lewis and Short s.v. volvo 1B 2), as the neighing horse snorts fury (ignem) from its nostrils (Graff v. 252). The horse's powerful breathing is significant (cf. Germ x). In an Indian ritual (Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa VII 3. 2. 12, cited by Coomaraswamy (a), 47–8, with other texts) 'the sacrificial horse is the Sun in a likeness, [it] is made to snuffle at the [bricks] of the Fire-altar' by the Priest. The bricks represent all worlds and all beings, the children of the Sun (who, as the Life of all things, is also the god Prajapati, 'Lord of children, people', a procreative aspect of Brahman; Bhattacharji 322–9). The snuffling of the horse 'bestows the Breath indeed upon' these children, for the god is in the horse: 'Prajapati . . . became the horse, and sniffed at them; they procreated themselves'. Compare Genesis 2: 7: ' . . . God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life'. What is remarkable for ON in the Indian texts is that the breath of life is breathed by a horse, the god is identified with the horse, and the horse is sacrificed (for further illustration see Sauv  185–6; also the valuable analyses of bracteate images of horses, whose mouths emit symbolically breath or utterance, in Motz (h), 20–7).

2. In Indian sacrificial practice the sacrificial tree or post may be regarded as standing for the sacrificer (Viennot 44). If the sacrificial tree is the world tree, and the sacrificer a god, the world tree then stands for the god himself. Sauv  cites the legend of Agni, the fire god, hiding from the other gods, and taking the form of a horse; he then lives in the world tree (here named aśvattha, 'horse-abode') for a year, identifying with both horse and tree (Sauv  187).

3. In the Indian horse sacrifice ritual, the priest, as he prepares the sacrifice, whispers into the ear of the horse the enumeration of all the good fortunes that will come because of the sacrifice (AR § 216). So   inn whispers into the ear of the sacrificed Baldr—the t vorr, heilagt tafn—as he lies on the funeral pyre (Vaf  54). We may guess that the secret is the renewal of the world's life and Baldr's. (Compare the healing of a horse by whispering in its ear in an OHG Charm, Braune 78, xxxi. 7. Wodan's magic power to heal a horse is seen in a Merseburg Spell, Braune 77, xxxi. 1b.) For rites of Indian horse sacrifice see esp. Dumont.

4. The sun as originator of life, and the horse as symbol of the moving sun (and therefore the appropriate sacrifice to be made for the renewal of the sun and the life it brings to the world), play a part in the mythology of   inn because he—or his IE ancestor—was a solar deity. He has only one eye, that sees everything—like the sun. He is a traveller visiting the homes of men—like the sun. His eclipse is to be swallowed by the great wolf—like the sun. And, like the sun, he is Alf  r (Gr m 48). See commentary to 21/5 on   inn's H -names; also R g Introd 1.D. Theme II.

This vast background of archaic fragments of tradition associated with the mythology of the sun helps to explain   inn's place as highest of the gods in Gmc and giver of breath to man in Vsp. It accounts also for the name of the world tree as Yggdrasill, the name of the god when he was himself the sacrifice and the sacrificer (H v 138), identified with the sacrificial tree itself (see 2. above).

19/3 ba mr, 'tree', occurs also in Vsp 27/4, Gr m 40/5 (Sigr r 11/5 has a less clear instance). It is no doubt an archaic form related to Gmc baum-*, OE b am, Gothic bagms, by ways not yet determined (AEW s.v., 'eine  berraschende form'). Ba mr may become barmr by dissimilation, as in BDr 9/2: hr  rbarm for -ba m (Noreen § 238. 3 n. 14, § 253. 1 n. 1).

19/3–4 ausinn hv taauri: the World Ash is laved by mud-rich water (I would suppose from the well at its foot, 27/5–6), an archetypal libation, happening here mysteriously without known agency. 'Guardian trees', representing the great tree, in the farms of Scandinavia and Germany, were given offerings of milk, beer, honey, to honour them and preserve their life (see AR § 249; Palm 60–3). Snorri interprets the moistening of the trees as just such a cult-libation, performed by 'norns' (SnE 24). Presumably he knew of the practice from his travels in Norway and Sweden and wished to make the myth in the poem more specific.

Aurr (as Vig sson well explains s.v.) has two distinct connotations: (a) in heathen mythological/religious vocabulary it signifies Earth, lifted wet from primordial waters, the precious and sacred source of man (cf. Germ ii; Aurgelmir in Vaf  32, 33), and is so recognized by the heavenly deities: I r . . . kalla aur uppregin (Alv 10); (b) in common parlance it is the mud of earth that clings to unshod feet (cf. R g 10/3), the alluvial deposit of rivers (becoming eyrr, new land from water once more), and finally a euphemism for excrement, a still fertilizing, but no longer sacred, soil (cf. Lks 48/4). Aurr in ambience (a) will imply the vivifying force of earth itself (iar  ar megin, Hyndl 38/2).

For the compound formation hv taaurr cf. hv tabj rn, Hv ta-Kr str.

19/5 Pa an: the exact source of the dews—whether the h r ba mr or the hv taaurr—is left ambiguous by the poet, in his swift collage of motifs. The libation, if realistic, would be upon the base of the trunk; the dripping dews would come from the over-arching boughs. The lines suggest a cycle: the laving at the tree's base promotes its growth, so that from its great height it can in its turn enrich the earth.

19/5–6  ggvar — falla: in HHv 28 dew drops into the valleys— gg i di pa dali—from the manes of the valkyries' horses (a notion borrowed no doubt from the cosmic horse of the night, Hr mfaxi, 'Rime Mane', from whose bit the valley dews fall, Vaf  14). The dew in HHv 28 brings a good season ( r); the morning dews in Vaf  45 nourish the two seedlings of mankind in 'Hoard-M mir's Wood' after the giant winter. For their traditional evocation of fecundity and continuous life the poet of Vsp alludes to the dew-wet valleys immediately before the climax of the never-fading tree (19/7). He leaves us with a 'natural' image of dew from the tree falling on to the cultivable land; the delightful fantasies of HHv 28, Vaf  14 (and Gr m 26) are not for his poem. For the motif of the nourishing liquid that drips from the world tree, see Tolley (a), 148.

19/8 Ur  ar brunni: in scholion 138 to Adam of Bremen iv. xxvi it is said that beside the great tree at the temple at Uppsala is a well where the heathens make their sacrifices, throwing into it a living man. If his body is not found, the people's prayer will be granted. If this is a true report, it suggests that great divine power and wisdom were attributed to hallowed wells. No such serious cult traditions are told of Urðr's well in ON texts: it is never used for any purpose, divinatory or votive. Indeed, in order to perform a function Urðr has to come out of it and carve runes (20/3, 7). Urðar brunnr has become a stage property, a symbolic place where a wise pulr—or Christ himself—may place his seat of authority (Háv 111; Eilífr Goðrúnarson, fragment cited in SnE 158; see also SnE 22; Weber (a), 148–54, and (b)). The poet of Vsp alone integrates Urðar brunnr thematically in the structure of his poem (Vsp Introd 11 stanzas 19–20), using Urðr in her abstract sense (Weber (a), 152–4).

20/3 ór þeim sæ: it is important to recognize that this is the poet's text, because sær relates to an ancient Norse belief, while v.l. sal does not. In PE only Vsp 20 and Grim 7 allude to an underwater realm, or realms, in which the wise maidens live, and where Óðinn and Sága drink in their hall 'where the cold waves echo above'. But, as Tolley points out ((a), 443–7), in Lappish tradition there is a spirit realm in the depths of lakes, the name of which, Saiva, is a borrowing of the primitive ON form of sær (saiw*-); and in Finnish tradition also there is an underwater spirit realm, which is entered by a submerged opening, or cleft, in the rock, which is called a lovi, and this term is probably a borrowing of ON klofi, 'cleft'. The Norse terms would not have been borrowed if the Norse traditions had not been prevalent. The wisdom of the lake maidens accords with the universal association of magical and divinatory powers with water, and especially with wells (see AR § 248; Akv commentary to 27/7; Bächtold-Stäubli s.v. Brunnen §§ 4, 6, 7, 8, 10).

20/5–8 Urð . . . Verðandi . . . Skuld: the poet has given his three administrators of fate names that are virtually a declension of time, Past, Present, and Future. This is in keeping with the theme of temporal urgency that later invests the poem (Vsp Introd 11 stanza 27 onwards). No analogue has been found for their trio of names. Only Urðr has her origin in tradition. Verðandi is a present participle, advancing upon the past element in Urðr's name, and (except in SnE 23) has no other occurrence either as a name or an active participle, as far as I can discover. The poet uses Skuld as a vaikyrie name (see commentary to 30/1–8); he may well have known her as a legendary villainess (Hrólfr 82–93). Skuld represents the future by virtue of her grammatical relationship to the verb skulu, a formidable future, if we judge by Vigfússon's interpretation of the vb.: 'Shall, must, denoting fate, law, bidding, need, necessity, duty, obligation, and the like'. The originality of these lake maidens as a variant of 'norms' becomes evident from AR §§ 191–3, where analogous traditions are discussed. They do not weave threads or bring baptismal gifts; they run nature's lottery.

skáro á skiði: when Norsemen drew lots, each man had a similar wooden piece which he marked with his own symbol; the pieces (hlutir) were tossed together on a cloth and picked out by hazard by one of the men (cf. Hkr III. 73). The wise maidens in Vsp do both the marking and the picking out (cf. kuro, 20/10; hlautvið kíosa, 60/2). Tacitus, Germ x, describes a similar selecting of marked twigs by priest or pater-familias for purposes of augury. Skiði implies a cut piece of wood (as in the Hkr incident) rather than a twig plucked from a living tree (as in Tacitus).

21–24 The poet presents the 'first war in the world' as a primordial event, a 'first happening' remembered by a vplva figure (hón) much as Vafþrúðnir remembers the birth and cradling of Bergelmir (Vafþr 35, also, for the fyrst-formula, 20, 26, 30, 34). It is a cult war between two distinct but complementary types of deity, who vie for worshippers and tribute. Because both types of god are essential to the well-being of the world and mankind, their war must necessarily end in a truce. It is, therefore, in a sense, a comedy war, and the poet has treated it as such. Dumézil first pointed to the traditional background of this mythical war, citing analogues from Indian myth ((g) 29–39, (h) 7–25; to which I would add Dionysus's assertion of his divine nature in the Bacchae of Euripides; in UD (f), 233–8, the Indian and Greek analogues are presented). Such a war is not, or not only, a conflict between older and newer deities ('hidden memories of the struggle between two faiths', SN 91, trans. 55), though such historical situations occur. The old mythical divine war expresses temperamental and ideological discord among men with, as so often, a touch of class at its roots. An illuminating comment on divine differences (not dissimilar to those between Æsir and Vanir) is given by Dodds (76): 'If I understand early Dionysiac ritual aright, its social function was essentially cathartic, in the psychological sense: it purged the individual of those infectious irrational impulses which, when dammed up, had given rise, as they have done in other cultures, to outbreaks of dancing mania and similar manifestations of collective hysteria; it relieved them by providing them with a ritual outlet. If that is so, Dionysus was in the Archaic Age as much a social necessity as Apollo; each ministered in his own way to the anxieties characteristic of a guilt-culture. Apollo promised security: "Understand your station as man; do as the Father tells you; and you will be safe tomorrow." Dionysus offered freedom: "Forget the difference and you will find the identity; join the θίασος [dance of worshippers], and you will be happy today." He was essentially a god of joy . . . And his joys were accessible to all including even slaves, as well as those freemen who were shut out from the old gentile cults. Apollo moved only in the best society, from the days when he was Hector's patron to the days when he canonised aristocratic athletes; but Dionysus was at all periods δημοτικός, a god of the people.'

Snorri's concern with the Æsir–Vanir war is virtually confined to its results—the integration of the gods, the creation of the mead of poetry—and throws little light upon the course of the war itself; SnE 82, Yng 12–13, ch. 4. I know of no allusion to the Æsir–Vanir fólkvið in skaldic verse (a major source for Snorri), and it may be that Snorri had no detailed text for it other than Vsp 21–4, which he may have found too cryptic to use with any precision.

21/1 man hón: on the alternation of pronouns ek and hón see Vsp Introd 1.c.

fólkvið: for a fuller attempt to trace the action of this fólkvið, see UD (f), 224–31.

21/3 Gullveigo: see Vsp Introd 11 ad loc. For the analogous idol Porgerðr Hølgabrúðr see Jómsvíkinga Saga 36–8, 51–2; Flat 1. 144, 213, 407.

21/4 geirom studdu: two senses of styðia may be played upon here, (a) 'to strike, hit with, thrust at' (Sturl (a) 1. 6: Bragi... styðr á hana reysprotanum, 'Bragi strikes at her with a reed shoot'; Ragnr 6: Mjök lét [Jormunrekkr] styðja Gjúka niðja, 'Vigorously [Jormunrekkr] had the descendants of Gjúki pelted'), and (b) 'to prop up' (Bisk 1. 528: En svá stóðo þjöktr spjót á Arone um hrið, at þá studdo hann aðrir spjótsoðdar, er öðrum var at lagit, 'But eventually spears were crowding so thick and fast upon Aron [Hjörleifsson], that some of the spears held him upright as others were launched at him'. As his sturdy corslet did not tear, it was long before his body fell to the ground). I translate studdu 'studded', in an attempt to convey both senses 'propped up' and 'struck into' (as by a nail; OED s.v. Stud sb.¹ I. 1., II. 5).

21/5 i holl: so Óðinn himself was tormented between the fires of Geirröðr's hall (Grim 1–2), and Hrólfr kraki and his men were tested by the fires of Aðils' hall (Hrólfr 71–3, ch. 41). The power to bear intense heat is an attribute of shamans (Eliade (b), 82–3), which Óðinn and Gullveig display.

Hárs: an Óðinn-name not found elsewhere in Eddic verse, but familiar in 10 c. skaldic verse in kennings for 'ale' and 'battle' (Hál 1/2: at Hárs líði; 7/2: at Hárs veðri; Vell 11/3–4: Laufa veðr... / lífkjöld, Hárs drifu, 'sword-storms cold to life, [in] Hárr's blizzard'; 35/2–3: rómu / Hárs við Hogná skúrir, '[in] Hárr's uproar, against Hogni's (weapon-)showers'). Of these verses it is only in Vell 11/4 that a disyllabic form (e.g. ? Háars*) is required by the metre (note the scribal attempt to provide a disyllabic form, Skjald A 1. 125; a preposition could also supply the needed syllable). Later skaldic texts, however, require a disyllabic form more frequently (so LP s.v. Hqarr, noting at the same time that the spelling is always with á, Hárs). In Vsp 21/5 a disyllabic form would be expected. The only attested meaning for hárr is adj. 'hoary' (cf. OE hār, OHG hēr which has also the sense 'lordly'). This fits well with the Eddic Óðinn, inn aldni, 'aged', Hárbarðr, 'Hoary Beard', fimbulþulr, 'the Sage', white-haired with wisdom (cf. Háv 134: at három þul; Fáf 34: inn hára þul).

In Eddic gnomic tradition a distinct name for Óðinn, with a stem Há-, has been cultivated, however, with the sense 'high', 'tall': Hár and Hávi (strong and weak forms of the adj.). Hár occurs only in a list of Óðinn names in Grim 46 (cf. Iafnhár 49), but Hávi is the alter ego of Óðinn's mischievous, trickster self Bqlverkr, 'Disaster-worker', in Hávamál, in whose hall—Háva hpllo í—mysteries could be learned and many wise counsels (Háv 111/7–8; note the ironies of 109/3–5). Hávi's hall is not for burning people, but for hearing wisdom.

We never encounter Óðinn as Hárr, Hár, or Hávi acting in the nominative (Hávi is found only in Pulur IV jj 4 (Skjald B 1. 673)). These are his possessive names, that stamp poetry, war, wisdom as his. At any time in the tradition of a god a fresh name might be cultivated for him—through syncretism, or to emphasize another aspect of him, or perhaps to replace an old ritual name whose significance was becoming arcane. This last possibility may be the cause of Óðinn's complex of Há- names, as Detter suggested in 1894. Óðinn had one eye and was popularly named 'weak eyed' and 'blind' (Bileygr, Helblindi, Gestumblindi). An ancient Gmc term for 'blind', a direct relation of Lat caecus, survives in Gothic haihs, 'one-eyed': in ON this would be hár (cf. Gothic -faihs, ON -fár 'coloured').

From such a base-name, referring to the fundamental characteristic of a solar deity, as Óðinn was in one of his origins, verbal play among the poets might seize upon near homonyms Hárr, 'Hoary', Hár/Hávi, 'High', to denote other aspects of the half-blind god Hár. We may note that 'high' is a natural and technical term to use of the sun ('Mun nú vera sólín svá há, at Ásbjörn, vinr yðarr, mun mega hanga?' Hkr II. 202). The name Hávi in Hávamál could therefore be as ancient as Hár, 'Blind', epitomizing Óðinn's moral as well as solar overview, his zone of influence over the high and low wisdom that his poem contains. From Hliðskjálf he could see into all worlds, even, from beneath his deep hood, to the little spider whose knees are higher than its belly (Heiðreksgátur, Hauksbók text, Hkb 367/4–6). I doubt if the Norsemen waited till the Christian period to give Óðinn the name Hávi.

In two of the skaldic texts cited above the earliest SnE MS. U reads Hás, not Hárs (Hál 7/2, Vell 35/3; note the error in Hál 1/2 MS. SR 'h^{as}'). Hás could be gen. sg. of Hár, 'Blind One', To account for the majority form Hárs, and for the metrically required disyllabic form, Háars*, Detter suggested an underlying compound name, 'Blind/One-eyed warrior', which he reconstructed haiha-harir*. The second element 'warrior' is difficult to reconstruct with confidence, since there is no runic form preserved, and in all possible analogues syncope has intervened (cf. Einarr from aina-harjaz*, AEW s.v.). See the valuable assessment of the problem by von See (e), 64–72.

21/6 hána brendo: burning was the right punishment for a witch (see Ström (a), 189–98), just as it was the right way to refine gold (brennt gull).

21/10 þó hón enn lifir: a similar phase occurs in Beowulf 3167 of the golden treasures buried with Beowulf's ashes: gold on grēote, / þær hit nú gēn lifað / eldum swā unnyt, / swā hit æror wæs, 'gold in the ground, where now it lives still, as profitless to men as it was before'. So a fragment of pagan symbolism survives in a Christian moral context.

22/1 Heiði: the acc. sg. in -i relates this name to fem. heiðr, 'heath', i.e. high, treeless, uninhabited land (Noreen § 384; cf. the woman's name Ragn(h)eiðr), etymologically related (probably) to heiðinn, 'heathen' (AEW s.vv., following Trier). This would point to a very archaic origin for the vplva-name Heiðr: implying 'one who belongs to the old settlements of the land, within the old (? implying aboriginal) boundaries' (a fitting name for a follower of the Vanir cult; Trier, esp. 83–103). Other terms with the stem heið- may be played upon in Heiðr's name: (a) heið, 'radiant sky', heiðr adj., 'bright' (used almost exclusively of sky, sun, and stars) could evoke the gleaming gold of her old name, Gullveig; (b) heið- as an element in the names of Heiðrún (the goat that yields the 'shining mead' of the gods, Grim 25) and Heiðdraupnir (the skull that drips sacred mead, Sigrdr 13–18) could evoke the bright elixir—veig—in her old name (cf. skírar veigar, BDr 7), as well, perhaps, as the intoxicants used in her performances; (c) heiðr masc., 'honour', could be evoked rightly, with reference to all the honour she was paid by her hosts (as was Þorbjörg litil-völva, Eiríks Saga rauða 207); (d) heið (of uncertain gender, see LP), 'fee', 'payment', could also be evoked, as a völva certainly expected some return for her services (cf. Vsp 29). The senses (a) and (b) of heið- are, I think, evoked in heiðvagnom, Vsp 27/3. The most valuable discussion of the term heið- signifying 'bright mead' is still that of Höckert.

22/3 völo velspá: though vel and spá are written separately in R (as compounds not infrequently are), it is likely that velspá (hap. leg.) is intended to be a formation similar to forspár, 'foreseeing the future', sannspár, 'prophesying what proves to be true'. Vel- may imply both that Heiðr performs well, never failing to answer her audience's questions, and—even more—that she always gave favourable prophecies. Travelling wise women who told unflattering fortunes would not be popular; they would not be thought to have earned the hospitality lavished on them (cf. Víga-Glúm 41, ch. 12). Háv 87–8 warns against trusting völu vilmæli, 'a völva's pleasing utterances'.

22/4 vítti: a vb. nowhere else recorded in ON, but from the context it would seem to be related to sb. vítt, which refers to objects, or apparatus, used in heathen worship or magic, prohibited in 12 c. Norwegian laws: Engi maðr skal hafa í húsi sínu staf eða stalla, vítt eða blót eða þat er til heiðins siðar veit, 'No man shall have in his house wand or altar, device for sorcery or sacrificial offering, or whatever relates to heathen practice' (Eiðsivapingslov 1. 24; see also 1. 45; NGL 1. 383). The appellation vitta véitr, 'creature of magic tools', is twice used in Ytal (3/3, 21/3) of witches working fatal spells. Vítti, vítt would seem to derive from the root w(e)ih-, seen also in ON vígja, 'consecrate', vé, 'sanctuary', and OE wiglian, 'to divine, prophesy': vítti (vb.) is probably formed from vítt (sb.) with a general sense of 'perform sorcery upon' (see Pipping IV. 1–12 on the etymology; he also regards Lks 24/3 vétt as a phonological variant of vítt; see commentary ad loc.) (CT). I have related vítti in Vsp 22 specifically to spirit conjuring because of the following ganda.

ganda: in a record of Lappish shamanism in the late 12 c. Historia Norvegiae a precise meaning for gandus (ON gandr) is given: 'There are some [of these magic-practising Lapps] who are revered as if they were prophets by the thick-witted common folk, because, by means of an unclean spirit, which they call a gandus, they will, whenever asked, predict to many people many future happenings, just as they turn out' (Sunt namque quidam ex ipsis, qui quasi prophetae a stolido vulgo venerantur, quoniam per immundum spiritum, quem gandum vocitant, multis multa praesagia ut eveniunt quandoque percunctati praedicent). In the account of a shamanic séance that follows, the shaman uses equipment which might be described as vítt: a cloth to cover him while he prepares for his spells, a drum-like vessel marked with images (of beasts, snow-shoes, a ship), symbols of the gandus's magic modes of travel (HN 85–6). So too might Heiðr summon her helpful informative gandir. For detailed analysis of this Lappish séance, and of the significations of gandr and related terms, see Tolley (a), 360–76; (b), esp. 146–8; (d), 62–73. In the translation I have defined the gandir as informative spirits to make clear that they are associated with Heiðr's prophetic powers in the preceding line.

22/5 Seið: seiðr was a professional exercise of psychic or 'magical' powers, designed to learn the unknown, control conditions and events, by communication with spirits and by the exploration of their world. Seiðr bears resemblance to forms of shamanism in these general aims as well as in its techniques of trance and the use of intoxicants for the purpose of ecstasy. Seiðr comprised also the power to cast spells: the greatest spell being that which brought the spirit of the dead or dying back to life (24/7–8). Etymologically, seiðr appears to belong among a group of IE words with an underlying sense of 'binding', but which often developed connotations of 'magical binding' (e.g. Welsh hud, 'illusion', Old Cornish hüd, 'magic, charm'); see S. Mann s.v. soitos. That the 'binding' in seiðr could refer both to the control of the spirits by the medium, and to the possession of the medium by the spirits, may have been an ambiguity accepted even in the pagan period (CT). For an introduction to literature on seiðr see AR § 237, and references there cited; for new guidance and detailed argument, see Tolley (a), 366–485 (on the possible relationship with Lappish sieidi see 373–4 and n. 16).

22/6 seið: here the pret. of siða.

leikin: here the suffix is that of the past part. of vb. leika, 'to play' (cf. Lks 19/5 where leikinn has the adjectival suffix, 'playful'). The passive implication of leikin suggests that Heiðr was 'played with, manipulated, possessed' by some external agency (as Simon Magus was 'manipulated, deluded' by the devil—leikinn af djöfli—when he claimed that he had risen from the dead and would now proceed to fly to heaven, Post 192). The precise external agency may not always be specified (it is dangerous to utter names). So, in the case of the shepherd at Fróðá (Eyrb 146, ch. 53), who is driven out of his mind, people say he is leikinn; we are left to surmise that the malignancy of Þorgunna's lurking spirit has fastened upon him. Though leikin may imply that Heiðr was in trance or ecstasy, the assumption would be that this was the result of some influence outside herself (see Fritzner s.v. leika § 5; Blöndal s.v. leika VI. 4; also Dodds ch. 3, 'The Blessings of Madness', esp. 66–7: 'It is the common belief of primitive peoples throughout the world that all types of mental disturbance are caused by supernatural interference').

22/7 angan: in ON only here and Vsp 51/8 (cf. Blöndal s.v.), a figurative use of the literal sense 'sweet scent', 'perfume', not (apparently) so used elsewhere.

22/8 illrar brúðar: I take this to represent the popular moral disapproval of married women who were intimate with sorceresses and might themselves dabble in spells to pursue personal enemies or lovers (cf. Katla in Eyrb 28, ch. 15). In the context of the Æsir–Vanir war it reflects the view of the Æsir.

23 Because Refrain I serves different contexts, its terms of reference shift slightly. The nameless powers, regin, of 6/1 are assumed to be the Æsir in 9/1. In 23/1 they must also be the Æsir, holding power still, though the term goðin qll, 23/7, implies that the Vanir are accepted as deities. The only way I can understand the stanza is to take eða, 23/7, as 'and' (a not uncommon sense, cf. 25/7; so too DH) rather than 'or'.

hvárt — gjalda: afráð is a legal term for 'tax', 'dues', but in colloquial idiom afráð gjalda has become a proverbial phrase meaning 'to pay excessively, suffer great loss, get the worst of a bargain' (see Fritzner s.v. afráð, NGL v s.v. afráð). If (as I understand it) the Æsir are faced with surrendering their monopoly of godhead and its revenues and joining with the all-too-popular Vanir, they are contemplating a very great loss in self-esteem and in wealth.

eða — gildi eiga: if they do agree to share with the Vanir, then they must be all gods together, recognized as equally genuine (gild) gods, to whom honour (gildi) is due, partners in the divine 'guild' and its sacred banquets (gildi), equally entitled to tribute (gildi). The poet plays on all the relevant senses of gildi noun, and gildr adj. (see Vigfússon, Fritzner s.vv.). The Æsir's only alternative to this unprofitable and demeaning share-policy is to attack again: which they do.

24/3–4 þat var — heimi: this seems an awkward way of saying that the first war had flared up again, but the attempt to improve it in H by substituting adv. fýrr, 'previously', is worse. A better original text may have been lost and the loss patched over in *R II by repeating 21/1–2.

24/5–8 See Vsp Introd II ad loc. for detailed discussion; also UD (f), 230–1.

25–26 See Vsp Introd II ad loc. for detailed discussion; also UD (c), where I have attempted a reconstruction of the hypothetical poem of the giant builder, which, I suggest, lay behind these two stanzas and Snorri's tale, SnE 45–7.

25/8 Óðs mey: only Snorri (SnE 38) tells us anything of Óðr: that he was Freyja's husband, that he departed on a long journey and Freyja wept for him and sought him over many lands. For the traditional grief of the goddess of love for her lost lover/husband see the funeral ode for Adonis attributed to Bion (text and fine translation by P. E. Legrand in Bion 193–8): Aphrodite, her hair unbound, no belt, no sandals, torn by thorns, crying aloud, runs through the deep valleys calling his name. There must have been an equivalent Norse tradition (see Alexiou, esp. ch. 4). Óðr's name is identical with óðr, 'spirit that survives death' (cf. Vsp 18/6): an almost allegorical husband for the goddess of resurrection. That Freyja should here be called mær makes her appear tender and vulnerable, as the context requires; mær is also used of other young wives (Guð I 16/8, HH I 5/3, Sigsk 15/7).

26/5 Á gengoz: for the two reflexive uses here involved see Vigfússon s.v. ganga D. Reflex. II; for the citation from Reykðæla Saga ch. 18 see ÍF 10. 210; note also Bjarn 175: þeir léti þetta á ganga [v.l. á gangask AM 488 4^o], i.e. they agreed that the scurrilous verses of Björn and Þórðr should cancel each other out.

26/8 á meðal vóro: see Fritzner s.vv. meðal § 2, milli § 4; also First Grammatical Treatise 32: . . . sé hann svá lítillátr í fróðleiksástinni, at hann vili nema lítla skynsemi heldr en engva, þá er á meðal verðr innar meiri, þá lesi hann þetta kápítulum vandliga, 'should he be so unassuming in his love of learning that he is willing to acquire a little understanding rather than none—when something stands in the way of [his acquiring] the greater learning—then he should read this chapter carefully' (my translation).

27 For detailed discussion of this complex stanza see Vsp Introd II ad loc.

27/2 hlióð: both 'hearing' (cf. Vsp 1/1) and 'sound' (klukku hlióð, 'sound of a bell'). In OE Riddle 14 (ASPR III. 187) the horn is described as a wind instrument, swallowing wind from some man's breast, summoning a troop to war, and also as a drinking vessel, filled by a courtly girl. I think it likely that in his use of hlióð in the sense 'sound' the poet of Vsp is alluding to Heimdallr's horn both as a sounding horn and as a drinking horn, as in the OE riddle (and, indeed, as Snorri understands it: Mímir is full of knowledge 'because he drinks from the well out of the horn Gjallarhorn', SnE 22). So hlióð, 'sound' i.e. 'horn', becomes associated with the well of mead (from which Óðinn takes his drink of wisdom, cf. 27/5–7, 28/7–12: a myth of which Sigrðr 13/6–10, including a dripping horn, seems to be a variant), as well as with Ragnarøk, when the horn's hlióð must sound (45). As to the acute hearing of the world tree, Heimdallr, huntsmen say that birds in a tree will hear a distant gunshot much sooner than a man standing near them (and fly off), because the ground carries the vibrations more swiftly than the air, and they are communicated via the tree's roots to the birds.

27/3 heiðvǫnom: probably a play on two senses of heið, 'shining mead' and 'shining heaven', the tree's roots being in the mead, its branches on the heavens (see commentary to 22/1); as emphasis in the stanza falls later on the gushing mead-well I would give priority to that sense of heið in translating heiðvǫnom.

27/8 Vitoð — hvat?: for vita in the sense 'to seek to know/find out', see Fritzner s.v., § 8. Eða hvat? I think indicates that the vplva is inviting the next question: 'and what [next do you seek to know]?'.
 28/1 ein sat hón úti: sitja úti traditionally implied 'to sit out of doors to listen for, contact, spirits', an occupation of wizards and witches—and vplur—condemned by the Church. Norwegian laws (NGL I. 19, 182) prohibit 'sitting out to wake up a troll to perform heathenism by means of it' (útisetu at vekia troll upp, at fremia heiðni með því); cf. OHG hliodarsazzo, 'sitting to listen'; Meissner (a), 102–10; Wesche; AR § 236.

28/3 Yggiungr: Óðinn calls himself Yggr, 'Terrible One', at the frightening close of Grim (53/2, 54/2), when he claims the life of his tormentor, Geirrøðr, but I do not know how to determine the significance of -ungr in this unique derivative.

28/5–6 fregnið. . . freistið: I take the pl. vb. to be a reference to a situation similar to that in BDr 1–2, where the deities are in dismay because of Baldr's evil dreams, and Óðinn, on behalf of them all, seeks a vplva to find out the cause. The poet of Vsp has, no doubt, known a traditional poem (or poems) of Óðinn's visit to a vplva, with its own narrative interests—the thunderous horse-ride, perhaps, as in BDr, and a yapping whelp bloody with corpse eating, and a vplva's corpse rearing up from the grave. BDr is a dialogue poem, but the Vsp poet never lets Óðinn speak: as far as we know, he uses only his formidable eye and his trinkets. Only after the vplva's foresight of Baldr's death and the mistletoe, does the Vsp poet introduce the traditional paraphernalia of Hǫðr's deed and the vengeance for it, omitting any unnecessary informative matter (such as Rindr, and Váli's name, cf. BDr 11). Though the genre of BDr must predate Vsp, the extant version of BDr has borrowings from the text of Vsp (e.g. in stanzas 9, 11). BDr gives us invaluable insights into the Vsp poet's distinctive narrative tastes. For a recent appreciation of BDr, with bibliography, see Párolí 137–61.

28/10 Mímis brunni: Snorri (SnE 22) cites Vsp 28/7–14, explaining that under one of Yggdrasill's roots, which leads to the frost-giants, stands Mímis brunni; it contains wisdom, and Mímir is its owner. Mímir is very wise, because he drinks from the brunni, using the Gjallarhorn (cf. Vsp 45) as his drinking horn. Óðinn asked for a drink from the brunni, but was not granted it until he gave his eye as a pledge in return. According to Vsp 27/5–7, 28/9–10, this eye is in the well itself, í enom. . . brunni. This situation is reminiscent of folk-riddles that 'explain' natural phenomena—such as the sun's reflection in water. Why has Óðinn—the sun—only one eye? Because he pledged the other to the well for a drink from it. Mímir here becomes a conventional folklore figure, the jealous possessor of a precious thing for which he exacts an exorbitant price. In Vsp this legend is entirely contained in the vplva's mockery of Óðinn and serves only to emphasize that those old wishing-wells of wisdom are now useless. Her authority is higher.

But Óðinn is by old tradition attached to a variant form of Mímir, namely his head (always referred to as Míms hǫfuð; the nom. Mímr* does not occur). He consults it—again, uselessly—as Ragnarǫk begins (45/7–8). Egill calls Óðinn Míms vinr (Sonat 23/5). In Sigrdr 14 Míms hǫfuð utters 'wisely the first word' and declares 'true (rune-)staves', and the magic rivers of runic mead-wisdom begin to flow (Sigrdr 15–20). Before Míms hǫfuð begins to speak, there are three lines stating that '[he] stood on a rock with a drawn sword (með Brimis eggjar), had a helmet on his head'. We assume that [he] is the Hroptir—Óðinn—of the preceding stanza 13: has he severed the Míms hǫfuð, a sacrifice at the inauguration of the words of truth and the runes that recorded them? The evidence is too fragile for any certain answer. Snorri accounts for Mímir's decapitated head as one outcome of the Æsir–Vanir war: in anger at the incompetence of the hostage Hœnir whom the Æsir had sent them, the Vanir decapitated the other hostage, Mímir, who was clever, and sent that head back to the Æsir to spite them (their logic is not clear). Óðinn embalmed Mímir's head and consulted it for wisdom (Yng ch. 4). This rather poor story may well be a fabrication of Snorri's own.

In IE tradition, especially Indian and Celtic, a severed head is an object of great potency, associated with the honey-drink of wisdom (Indian) and wells of wisdom (Celtic). Severed human heads with powers of prophecy are frequent in Celtic legend, and 'in sacred wells and pools of the Roman-British period' skulls are found, dedicated, it would seem, to strengthen the occult powers of the water (see Simpson for valuable discussion, with further reference, 44–5 and n. 12, to works of Anne Ross). The Indian myths of sacrificial beheading attribute to the severed head a supernal knowledge: 'The head is associated with, contains a treasure or a secret that is the essence of the universe' (Heesterman 25). Restoration of life to a severed head, so that it can speak, belongs to the healing skills of the Ásvins; it is the severed head of a great sage that teaches the Ásvins themselves the honey secret of Soma (madhu-vidya, 'mead-wisdom'). See also UD (f), 235–6. As far as I know, only Indian and Norse sources associate the severed head with mead.

Mímir/Mímr must be a very old mythological figure. His name might fitly be related to Lat memor, 'remembering', memoria, 'memory': particularly apt for a being who is only a head. The scarcity of Gmc cognates (AEW s.v.) no doubt reflects Mímir's archaic origins. His long existence would account for the unreconcilable diversity of the roles he plays in ON tradition: he is an 'old giant' søkk-Mímir tricked by Óðinn in an adventure not otherwise known (Grím 50); he has other hostile giant associations in the giantess kenning in Dórsdr 9/6: hrek-Mímis ekkjur, 'widows of crafty Mímir', and the enemy warrior kenning for Hundigr in HH I 14/8, geir-Mímir. His name is attached also to two of the nine heavens as if he were an elemental being: hregg ('storm')–Mímir, vet (?)–Mímir (SnE 212; LP s.vv.).

The name Mímir is also associated with the mythology of the world tree. In Vafþ 45/3 holt hodd-Mímis, 'Hoard-Mímir's Wood' is the shelter for the last human couple who will live on into the new world after the 'Giant Winter'. In the late thirteenth-century romantic adventure of Svipdagsmál, the world tree appears as Mimameiðr, 'Mimi's Tree', imported into the poem to stand by the heroine's palace and enhance the poem's grandeur (Robinson 382–6). Associations with mankind, its health and fortunes, cling to Mimameiðr like an inheritance from the paternal Heimdallr: a power to heal certain ailments of women (and perhaps aid in childbirth: the text is difficult) and be með mǫnnum mjǫtuðr, 'destiny among men' (Fjolsvinismál 22). See commentary to 1/3–4 for references on Heimdallr and man.

Was Mímir's name given to the world tree because it grew out of the prophetic well at its roots, Mímis brunni? Only once in ON sources is Heimdallr accredited with a prophetic sense (Þrym 15). If Mímir/Mímr/Mimi were thought of as names for the world tree, and so for Heimdallr, may we interpret Míms synir, 45/1, as 'mankind', sons of Heimdallr, rather than sons of a giant (cf. synir Suttunga, Skm 34/3)?

A final problem is the direct association of Heimdallr with a severed head. In SnE 98–9, apparently on the authority of the Heimdallargaldr, Snorri recounts the saying that Heimdallr was struck through by a man's head, and after that a head is called mjǫtuðr Heimdallar, 'Heimdallr's fate'. Then, since a sword is called manns mjǫtuðr, 'man's fate', a sword can be called 'Heimdallr's head'. The legend, or riddle, behind this is not known. Young 103–5 notes that an Irish tale in the Rennes Dinnsenchas has some remarkable motifs that recall motifs associated in ON with Heimdallr: (a) an Irish king's grandson is captured by nine submarine women and sleeps one night with each; (b) one woman is with child by him; (c) he leaves, promising to return, and when he does not, the nine women, with his son, pursue him in vain over the sea; the mother then cuts off the child's head and flings it after the father. We can hear the echoes of Heimdallr's nine mothers, his precisely timed sleeping with different women, a decapitated head hurled as a weapon. The story traditions seem to have been tossed too far from their original patterns for them to reveal any of their old meaning. More precise research might bring better results, nevertheless. It may be worth noting that in Indian myth a head might be a formidable weapon, like the horse head of the sage Dadhyañc with which Indra slew the demons (O'Flaherty 58–9). A legendary sword was named 'Brahma's Head' (Coomaraswamy (b) contains much that is illuminating on the cutting off and restoration of heads).

29 – 32 See Vsp Introd 11 ad loc.

29/3 Fékk spiðll: MS. 'fe spiðll'. It is possible that after hringa ok men, fé did originally follow (as more 'wealth' offered, or as part of a description of the vplva as fégiðrn, etc.), and that this caused haplography of two lines before fé[kk] spiðll. The simplicity of the emended text fékk—he gave and he [got]—is not unattractive.

spaklig: on the close link between 'wise' and 'far-sighted' in the semantics of spakligr (spakr, spakmæli) see Fritzner s.v. spakr § 3 (e.g. Bisk 1. 264: Pat er spát, er spakir mæla, 'It is foretold if wise men say it'). See commentary on 1/7 form spiðll fira.

29/6 verpld: I take this to be here synonymous with heimr, '(any) world'. In 44/10 verpld would seem to relate most to the 'world of men'.

30 Because three of the valkyrie names here are found in Hákonarmál, Göndul, Skögul, and Geirskögul (in Hákonarmál a variant name for Skögul), we are led to see other signs of the poet's possible use of that poem in Vsp. The riding valkyries open the action, coming to choose the king who must die (we might say this of both poems). In Hákonarmál they are explicitly sent by Óðinn. There appears to be no statement in any of the verses extant about Hákon's last battle which tells how it happened that Hákon, though victorious, met his death. In Fagrsk (93) he is wounded in the right arm by an arrow as he pursues the fleeing enemy, i.e. by natural hazard of war. But in some other sources it is reported differently: the unexpected arrow (a long, spear-like arrow in Hkr 1. 190–1) was either malevolently guided by the witch-queen Gunnhildr or thrown, on her instructions, by her little page (see also HN 107). In Hákonarmál there is emphasis on the valkyries' pleasure at Hákon's death and the warmth of Óðinn's welcome. But it was an 'unfair' death—like Baldr's. Has legend begun to make Hákon's death conform to the mythic pattern of an Odinic sacrifice? If so, and if the legend sprang up soon after Hákon's death (960), this may have led the Vsp poet to allude to it—as I think he does—immediately before his stanzas (31, 32) on Baldr's death. Hákon, a good prince, a Christian who chooses to be buried as a heathen, prefigures the ideal til goðþjóðar: FJ is surely right in taking this to mean 'to the gods' land, realm' (LP s.v.): a play perhaps on the more usual Gotþjóð, 'people, land of the Goths' of heroic verse. The valkyries accompany the gods at Baldr's funeral in Húdr.

Prince, Baldr, killed by abstract war, Höðr. It fits the religious brinkmanship of his poem well.

Geirskögul: it may seem surprising that a poet who knew Hákonarmál should cite this as a separate valkyrie name, when Hákon addresses it to Skögul (perhaps simply to honour her war prowess). All six valkyrie names in the stanza appear in the pula of the heiti of the valkyries of Viðrir (Óðinn), Skjald B 1. 678; Skögul, Gunnr, Hildr, Göndul are widely used valkyrie names, but Geirskögul is only in Hákonarmál and in Vsp. Skuld is not used as a valkyrie name in prose or verse, except in the pula and in Vsp. Has the poet deliberately given Skuld, 'Future Destiny', a valkyrie part to play in this killing, though other poets have not thought of it as one of her roles? See commentary to 20/5–8.

31/1 Baldri: for full discussion of the name see Green 3–55; AR §§ 476–90.

31/2 tívor: hap. leg. in ON; most probably borrowed from OE tiber, tifer (though possibly native to ON as a word of Gmc origin; cf. Gothic tibr (MS. 'aibr'), OHG zebar). The related ON tafn, 'beast for sacrifice', 'sacrificial feast' (cf. Lat daps) is used of Baldr's corpse in Húdr 9/3. In OE tifer occurs in biblical verse of Isaac: Exodus 415–16: Ne wolde him beorht fæder / bearn ætniman, / hālig tiber, 'The radiant Father would not take the child from him, a hallowed sacrifice'; and of Christ: Christ and Satan 573–5: ... Iūdas ... / se ðe ær on tife / torhtne gesalde, / drihten hælend, 'Judas who before gave in sacrifice the glorious Lord and Saviour'. For a lucid exposition of OE tifer see Jente 42–4. The variant suffix -orr in tívor (cf. jððorr / jaðarr; Jóhannesson (b) § 290; (c) §§ 21, 128) may also be recorded in the OHG gloss ceburhaftiu, 'holocaustomata' (sic; Graff v. 580). The medial -v- spelling instead of customary -f- is found twelve times in R; Lindblad 217. The alternative interpretation of tívor, 31/2, as a secondary formation from tívar, pl. of týr, 'god', has no sound analogies.

32/2 mær: for the parallel forms mær/miór see Noreen § 106.

32/5–8 Baldrs bróðir — vega: only Saxo tells the story of this brother (III. iv). Óðinn heard a prophecy that Baldr could only be avenged by a son he would beget on a princess Rindr. In a disreputable adventure into a distant land (mocked by Loki, see commentary to Lks 24), Óðinn achieves his seduction with the help of seiðr. In Saxo the vengeance does not take place when the son is one night old, but at a normal age; it is without éclat, and the avenger himself dies shortly afterwards of his wounds. As de Vries suggests ((f), 46–7), in Vsp 32 the night-old warrior symbolizes rebirth after death. In initiation ritual the young man undergoes death in appearance, and when he is born again as a mature warrior, often he may imitate an infant, drinking milk, ignorant of speech; that indicates his state of rebirth, when he can fight like a man after one night of new life (de Vries compares with Váli the three-night-old Magni who releases his father Þórr from Hrungrnir's great foot, SnE 103). With initiation come the vows of deprivation before a great deed—no civilized washing of hands or combing of hair till the act is done. AR §§ 336–8 (also Index s.v. Initiation) offers a valuable introduction to this wide subject in Germanic.

33/6 Fensplóm: no doubt a subterranean water-palace like the submarine Sökkvabekkr (Grím 7). Fen, 'quagmire', might imply great pools leading deep down into the marshes, such as those into which Egill cast his treasure and his slaughtered slaves as an offering to Óðinn (Egil 297–8). On the association of the goddesses with prophetic water-realms see commentary to Vsp 20/3, Lks 21/4–6. Sága, who drinks with Óðinn in Sökkvabekkr, personifies Frigg's aspect as 'prophetess' (AR § 554).

34/1–4 Hapt . . . lægjarns líki / Loka áþekkian: I construe hapt áþekkian acc., líki dat., lægjarns Loka gen. For other misreadings associated with confusion of long 'f' and 'l' in Vsp see 9/8: Blám leggiom for Bláins leggiom; 59/7: vés (MS. 'vel').

34/2 Hveralundi: a variant aspect of the well beneath the world tree: here the natural 'cauldrons' of hot volcanic springs form a suitably infernal environment for the punishment of Loki. In Grím 26 the pool beneath the tree, from which the earth's rivers flow, is Hvergelmir, 'Roaring Ocean of the Cauldron/Hot spring', and in Grím 29 two hot springs—Kerlaugar—must be waded before the tree is reached. While hot springs most immediately bring Iceland to mind, their proximity to the tree can only relate to a mythological, not a natural landscape (at least as far as Iceland is concerned). For the punishment of Loki and Sigyn's role see Lks prose epilogue; SnE 69–70. The link of hostile water from 34 to 35 to 38 seems designed. On hverr in place-names see Kuhn (a).

35/2 eiðrdala: valleys freezing from their deadly cold rivers. A deep, powerful river, so cold that it causes instant mortification if any flesh is splashed (vatnit var svá kalt, at þegar hljóp drep í, ef nokkut vöknadi) is described in Þorsteins Páttir bæjarmagns 404 (the hero's toe falls victim). Such murderous cold is conceived of as vitriolic: the mighty currents Þórr crosses, Þórsdr 5/7–8, are snorting poison—eiðri . . . þjóðáar fnaestu—while pelted by hail—af hagli oltnar (5/3).

35/3 spxom ok sverðom: so too the otherworld river that Hadingus is taken over: 'a river of blue-black water . . . spinning in its swift eddies weapons of various kinds' (liventis aquae fluvium diversi generis tela rapido volumine detorquentem, Saxo l. viii. 14; History 1. 31). Cf. also the river Geirvimul, 'Spear-Swarming', Grím 27/7.

36/2 Niðavpllom: for the tradition of plains in the underworld see Carey 14–15.

36/3, 7 salr . . . biórsalr: the variety of halls in the otherworlds of Vsp (cf. 37/1, 42/8, 61/1, and the -tóptir of 59/6) is difficult to parallel in vision literature, where the

jewelled walls of heaven and the torment house of hell—mānhūs . . . fæst under foldan, / þær bið fyr and myrm, / open ēce scræf / yfela gehwylces, 'house of evil, fast beneath the earth, where fire and serpent are, open eternal cave of every evil', Exodus 535–7—seem to suffice. Are the many halls a characteristic of a popular shamanic genre in Norse? When Óðinn begins his vision in Grím, it is the salir and the salkynni of the gods that he sees. This focus upon halls most probably reflects the central role of the grander farms in thinly populated countrysides, as in Norway, Iceland, Ireland, where every traveller hopes for shelter. A shaman would no doubt build upon familiar images to set in relief the significant differences of his vision world.

36/4 Sindri is assumed to be a dwarf, since such a race would be most likely to possess a hall of gold gleaming in the moonless dark. It is conceivable that some reference was made to Sindri's race in the lost lines after stanza 9 (cf. dverga dróttir, 9/5–6). The textual authority for him as a dwarf is late (SnE 122, notes to line 15), but etymologically he must be related to sindr, 'sinders, glowing sparks from hammered red-hot iron' (AEW s.v.), and so be a personification of the smith's craft. With the name Sindri we may compare the names Brisingr, Brisingar, 'Fiery, Flaming One(s)', with which Freyja's girdle/necklace is linked (Haustr 9, Prym 13, 15, 19). In the Pulur brisingr is a heiti for fire, see LP; it may well be etymologically related to brasa, 'to bake, roast', see commentary to Am 60/1 bras (on the ablaut relationship see Noreen § 172. 2, gnípa: gnapa). According to Sqrla Páttir ch. 1, Freyja's necklace was fashioned for her by four dwarfs who were goldsmiths. I suggest that the Brisingar are to be identified with Sindra ætt, as Brimir is with Ægir. Snorri, who paraphrases this stanza (SnE 74), makes Sindri the name of the golden hall.

36/6 Ókólnir is not mentioned elsewhere and may well be the poet's own invention, to contrast most plainly with the bitter cold valleys (35) and sun-deserted beach (37).

36/8 Brimir, alias Ægir (see commentary to 9/7), brews in the ocean depths the beer of the gods, that is, the mead/soma of immortality (mythologically speaking; see Lks Introd 1). In the prose prologue to Lks it is stated that in Ægir's hall lýsigull, 'lucent gold' (see Fritzner s.v.), was used instead of candles. Therefore it is significant that Brimir has textual neighbours—he and Sindra ætt inhabit the same stanza—with gold enough to build a salr for themselves and—no doubt—to give him lighting. It would seem that the two mythological statements in stanza 36 are deliberately placed between stanzas of menace and despair to convey a secret optimism: (a) that the dwarfs' gold, the 'light, fire, of the ocean' in so many kennings, is still there, so that the aurr of earth, the blazing gold of Freyja's Brisinga men, and of Gefjun's djúpröðull, can rise into daylight again, and (b) that the elixir of immortal life is still being brewed. The stanza is a hint of fundamental continuance. See commentary to Lks 20. For gold kennings see Meissner (b), 229–37. On the motif of the descent of fire (represented by the Brisinga men) into the ocean, and the connection with rebirth, see Tolley (e), esp. 91–3.

38/1–6 On possible borrowing here from Christian stereotypes see Vsp Introd iv; UD (j), 10, 14, 16; (k), 121. Stanzas 38 and 44 stand out from the rest of the poem (a) because they are wholly concerned with mankind, and (b) because they show the punishments for mankind's sins. We have little to compare these stanzas with in ON texts that we can be sure are free from Christian influence. The punishment for men who exchange libellous words (Reg 4) is to wade in a raging river, Vaðgelmir, 'Ford Roarer'. The poet of Vsp may well be drawing upon native matter of such a kind when he shows the perjurers and murderers laboriously wading; it is a punishment not much favoured in Christian visions of hell, unless the river is one of fiery pitch (as in the vision of a monk of Wenlock, related by Boniface, Briefe 10, 11/12, AD 716), but it is meaningful to those who know the torrents of Norway and Iceland that only one as strong as Þórr could cross (cf. Pórsdr).

menn meinsvara / ok morðvarga: the pairing of these weighty legal words recalls Wulfstan's alliterative denunciatory style: hēr syndan mǣnsworan and morþorwyrhtan, 'here are perjurers and plotters of murder' (Wulfstan (a), 273). The association of the words meinsvara/mǣnsworan with morð-/morþor- occurs nowhere else in ON or OE. For a valuable critique of scholarly opinion on these verbal parallels and their implications, see Lindow (a), 313–23.

þannz annars glepr / eyrarúno: I am not convinced that these lines are part of the original poem. The intimate, domestic treachery is out of key with the broad evils of oath-breaking and murder, and better fitted to the niceties of Hávamál (cf. Háv 115, where the only other instance of eyrarúna, 'a woman who whispers secrets in your ear', occurs).

38/7 Níðhoggr: I have preferred Níð-, 'Malice', to Nið-, '(Moonless) Dark' (SN), because níð is associated with the other naðr of the poem (53/11–12, cf. 62/3), though 'Striker in the Dark' would not be without meaning.

39/2 Járnviði: in aldna is identified as a giantess by this location, since járnviðja (cf. iviðiur, Vsp 2/6) is the term applied to Skaði, the giant's daughter, in Hál 3/4. Skaði, like in aldna, had ample progeny, bearing 'many sons' to Óðinn (Hál 4; see Davidson 87–95).

39/4 Fenris: see SnE 34–8 for the wolf Fenrir's history.

39/7–8 tungls tiugari / í trollz hami: that a wolf in the guise of a troll, or giant, should snatch the moon, suggests that the poet is confronting us with a synthesis of two versions of a moon-snatching legend, (a) that in which a wolf swallows the moon (as in the Indian myth cited in Lks Introd 1. 1), and (b) that in which a giant takes—or tries to take—the moon (as in the tale of the giant builder, 25–6, or a variant of it). Tungl could mean any heavenly body, but here it must mean 'moon' since three allusions to the sun follow in Vsp (40, 50, 54), none of them to its swallowing by a wolf, or stealing by a troll. In Grím 39 the sun is both preceded and pursued by a wolf. Snorri asserts that the preceding wolf will seize the moon, and the pursuing wolf will seize the sun (but this is not in Grím). Then in his explication of Vsp 39

(SnE 18–19), he presents another giant-monster in the shape of a wolf, Mánagarmr, 'Moon Hound', who will swallow the moon. The name Mánagarmr, not found in verse, suggests that Snorri knew a folk-tradition. In Vafþ 46, 47 it is explicitly said that Fenrir will destroy the sun. In Pórsdr 4 a giant is described in a kenning as the 'war wolf (gunnvargr), predator' of the 'fair shield of heaven' (himintorgu fríðrar), i.e. thief or destroyer of the sun. Giants and wolves were evidently closely associated, even interchangeable, from the earliest poetic sources (see Davidson, 581).

tiugari, hap. leg. would seem to be an agental noun based on the Gmc vb. teuhan*, OE tēon, 'to pull'; AEW s.v. tog.

40/3–5 rjóðr — sólskin: for the falling of blood-rain and darkening of the sky, heralding death, cf. Eyrb 140.

41/4 Eggþér: nothing is known of this pastoral giant, guarding his sheep and playing his harp. Some legend of him may have caused Saxo to use him as a Finnish/Lappish enemy of the Swedes (v. xiii. 1, vii. ii. 12). Certainly Väinämöinen made and played the zither-like kantele. And giants and Lapps are expert in magic. Eggþér's name, however, is Gmc (though rare; cf. Ecgeþow, father of Beowulf; for his history, see Beomulf 459–72).

41/6 Gálgviði: trees and woods were a natural gallows for vanquished enemies, criminals, dedicated human sacrifices (cf. Tacitus, Annales 1. lxi, where Arminius had impaled Roman heads on trees—truncis arborum antefixa ora—in the maestos locos, 'sorrowful places', of the Teutoburgian Wood; also Germ xii: proditores et transfugas arboribus suspendunt, 'they hang traitors and deserters on trees'; also Adam of Bremen iv. xxvi–xxvii on the sacrificial grove at Uppsala, and Ström (a), 115–61). I read H gálgviði in the text because it is the more direct reference to a place of sorrow and gloom (where a happy harpist is a bad omen) than R gálgviði, 'Gosling Wood', even if it is interpreted 'Raven Wood' (cf. commentary to Akv 40/2). The variant readings gálgvegr and gálgvegr occur in Gróug 9, of a path where enemies stand ready to kill; influence from MSS. of Vsp would seem to be evident: see Robinson 94–5, 308, for pointed comment; he also notes (92) other instances of apparent metathesis or scribal inversion of letters in Gróug and in R. On gl > lg see Noreen § 313. 3.

41/8 Fialarr: seemingly also a generic name for 'giant' (cf. Háv 14, for Suttungr; Hárþ 26, for Skrymir), and a dwarf-name (Vsp 16). It is difficult to see a common element in these uses which might give a meaning to the name.

For the cockcrow as a waking to war, see Hkr II. 361–2, where Þormóðr recites Bjarkamál in fornu before the battle of Stiklastaðir: Dagr es upp kominn, / dýnja hana fjaðrar, / mál es vílmqum / at vinna erfði, 'The day has risen, the cock's wings are beating, it is time for toil's sons to fulfil their hard task'. For another named cock, waking (dead) warriors, see HH II 49.

42/4 Heriafþörs: lit. 'Father of Armies'.

43/1 Garmr: the Hell Hound, named probably from the sound of his deep howling bark; cf. OE gloss to Psalm 37: 9: Íc gyrnde rugiebam [a gemitu cordis mei], 'I bellowed, howled from the grieving of my heart', BT s.v. gyrman (probably derived from gierman* < garmjan*; see EDD s.v. Yirm).

43/2 Gnipahelli: a descriptive name found only in Vsp. We should probably imagine a cavernous opening—hellir—in a towering, overhanging—Gnipa—rock-face. Though Gnipa- is rare, gnapa vb., 'to jut out, loom over', is common, and used of dominating mountains (see Vigfússon s.v.).

43/4 freki, 'greedy one', is a traditional 'name' for wolf (cf. Grím 19).

43/5–6 Fiðlð — lengra: see Vsp Introd I. C.

43/8 rpm, 'strong', 'supernaturally potent, intractable', 'bitter (to the taste)'.

44/3 Bræðr muno beriaz: such brief minatory prophecies recall biblical, sibylline, and homiletic texts (Matthew 10: 21: Tradet autem frater fratrem in mortem, et pater filium . . .). Though fraternal killings are recorded in Norse lands not infrequently (cf. Hkr I. 139; Íslb 8), statistics from Sturlunga Saga suggest that most brothers fought together in cases of feud (Nordal 63–5).

44/4 sífiom spilla: i.e. marry or have sexual relationship within the forbidden categories of kinship (NGL v s.v. sífiaspjall, -spell; see also the valuable note in DH). To read the phrase as 'violate kinship' by killing (cf. SnE 70) would only make it a variant of 44/1–2. Fratricide is one violation of human laws, incest is another, bringing blight and cosmic disharmony (see Bächtold-Stäubli s.v. Blutschande). Spilla is commonly used of having sexual intercourse with a woman to her detriment (Fritzner s.v. spilla § 2; *óspillt mæ*r, 'undefiled virgin').

44/6 *hórdóm*r, 'adultery', 'fornication', 'prostitution', synonymous with hór neut., hóran fem.; see Fritzner s.vv. The stem hór- is common Gmc, related to Lat cārus adj., 'beloved'.

45/1–2 Leika Míms synir: the problem of Mímir/Mímr is presented in the commentary to 28/10. I have chosen to interpret Míms here as 'Heimdallr's' and his sons as 'mankind'. Leika, 'play', is then ironically used of the unbridled behaviour of men, exposed in the preceding stanza, and in 45/2 en is adversative: 'but (as they play) their fate is lit, burning to its end'. If we take Míms synir as giants, then leika implies that they are rejoicing as mankind's, and the gods', fate approaches.

miptuðr kyndiz: on the interpretation 'fate's measure' see Vsp Introd II on stanza 2 (miptviðr). Kyndiz may be passive, 'is lit, kindled', or reflexive, 'kindles (itself)'. The only instrument of light whose measurement is equated with human life, of which I know, is the candle of Norna-Gestr in his Pátr (Fas I. 186–7). Two candles were burning beside Gestr's cradle when he was a baby; norns were prophesying a fine life for him, except for the smallest norn, who had been pushed about by some rowdies and decided to prophesy otherwise: 'I declare he will live no longer than that candle burning beside him'. But an older norn blew out the candle and gave it to Gestr's mother to keep, saying not to light it before the last day of his life. Gestr, after three hundred years of life, is about to be christened and agrees with King Óláfr Tryggvason that he has lived long enough. Óláfr suggests that now he should light the candle his mother gave him. He does. It burns quickly. It burned to its end the same moment that Gestr died. The significant parallel with Vsp is that the lighting of the candle takes place just before the moment of death, as if indeed Norna-Gestr's fate were being kindled. In early Christian Iceland candles were made to the measurements of an ailing person—for an aching head, the size of the head's circumference, for a dangerous pregnancy, the length of a girdle, and often, for other trouble, the whole height of the patient (Bisk I. 178, 190, 252; Bysk II. 130–1). The candle was lit and dedicated to the saint (Jón, Þorlákr). The patient's life was always saved in these miracles (see Graham 162–7). Behind this religious practice probably lies the everyday economy of reckoning the mjpt of candle required for different needs (e.g. an ell-long candle was reckoned for fleecing at night the ten skins of the gelding rams killed on average per day; Íslenskir þjóðhættir 6, 92). The measured candle becomes an image of time passing for an allotted span, and the act of lighting becomes the beginning of the end, whether of labour, or of illness, or of life. For (rare) parallels see Bächtold-Stäubli s.v. Lebenslicht. It would seem that the Anglo-Saxons also placed a certain faith in the efficacy of a well-measured, lighted candle. In the 13 c. Abingdon Chronicle, for the years 941–6, it is told that monks of the Monastery proved their right to some land by floating down the Thames a shield with a handful of corn on it, and on top of that a candle circumspectae quantitatis et grossitudinis, 'of carefully planned length and thickness', which the monks had lit. When the shield reached the disputed land, a water-surrounded meadow, 'the candle, miraculously abandoning the main stream of the Thames, changed its course and circled round the meadow'. As the writer says that it was the candle that controlled these movements not the shield or the corn, it must have been in the candle that the monks most placed their hopes. Was it measured so carefully to ensure calculation of their mjpt? The sense 'destiny, fate', 'measured end' for OE meotod (ON mjptuðr) survives in compounds (e.g. meotodsceft, 'fate', 'death'; Grein s.v.), though it has early been converted into a term for God. (On the Abingdon Chronicle account, and its relevance to (other) OE and ON traditions, see further Tolley (f).)

45/3–4 at — Gíallarhorni: I am not happy to take at as instrumental (DH), since the horn does not cause the kindling of fate, but marks its happening.

galla: a rare variant of giallr, 'resounding' (cf. Þrymgöll, 'Mighty Sounding', a church bell; SN).

Gíallar-, gen. of Gíoll, 'Noisy One' (like the hell-bent river Gíoll, Grím 28), presumably a name for the horn (cf. Fenrisúlfr).

45/8 Míms hofuð: see commentary to 28/10.

45/12 iptunn: this must be Loki, changed into an agent of the world's destruction. Only he and the wolf are in bonds, which both will break. For a fearful picture of Útgarða-Loki (Útgarthilocus) in chains see Saxo viii. xv. 8; also OE (Later) Genesis 371–85 for Satan in chains. For the loosing of Satan's bonds post mille annos, see Wulfstan (a), 133–7: nū syndon Satanases bendas swýðe tōslope, 'now are Satan's bonds greatly slackened'. For Loki as causer of earthquakes, see Lks prose epilogue.

47/1 Hrymr: not otherwise known. His name must be related to hruma, hryma, 'to grow weak with age', adj. hrumr, though his approach, as the first attacker, is far from feeble. Great age is a characteristic of the giants, first inhabitants of the world.

47/3 Iǫrmungandr: Iǫrmun- is a very archaic Gmc term probably going back to an IE term for 'Aryan people' (AEW s.v. Iǫrmunr, an Óðinn name). Tacitus, Germ ii, records the Herminones as one of the three first Gmc tribes founded by the sons of Mannus, himself the grandson of Earth. In its extant uses, many centuries later, Iǫrmun- can only be interpreted as 'powerful', 'vast' (cf. OS Irmīnsūl, 'Huge (World-bearing) Pillar'; OE eormengrund, 'spacious earth').

For -gandr, 'spirit', see commentary to 22/4. While gandr is used of wolves, as the helping spirits of witches, it is only used of the world serpent in Ragnǫr 16 and Vsp, when attacking Þórr. The implication (if any) is presumably that it has a magically hostile force in its mission to kill the god. The poet of Vsp has no doubt deliberately cited Bragi's name for the serpent to bring into contrast the two encounters, victory and death. In the translation I have adopted the Scottish term 'wraith', meaning 'water spirit', to give the monster a touch of the uncanny.

47/7 neffǫlr: some kinds of eagle have beaks lighter than their plumage; this could be intended then as a naturalistic description. There may be allusion to this image of birds of prey in the gibe that pale-nosed people ate corpses at night (Alv 2/2–3; cf. HH I 36/3–4, 9–10). The H, SnE reading niðfǫlr, 'pale as (or in) the moonless dark', is difficult to relate to the context; as also is niðfǫlr, 'malice pale', used of an eagle.

47/8 Naglfar, 'Nail Ship', is made of the uncut nails of corpses; it is therefore wise to cut the nails of the dead, so that this death ship should not be too quickly built (SnE 71).

48/2–3 Muspellz... lýðir: the ancient German term for the dissolution of the earth on Judgement Day, OHG Muspilli, OS Mudspilli, Mutspilli (only recorded these three times), has been translated into a demonic personality in ON, a being with 'sons' in Lks 42/4 and with sea-borne troops in Vsp. The literal sense of the two elements of the name is disputed, but the first could be a term for 'earth' (cf. OHG mu-werf, 'earth-thrower', i.e. 'mole'), the second for destruction (from Gmc spelþian*, 'to destroy'; AEW s.v. spilla; Braune 158–60). ON spell, 'destruction', is not uncommon (cf. Guð I 24: Brynhildr is vīnspell / vīfa mest, 'of all women the greatest in bringing destruction to lovers'). For Snorri's geographical concept of Muspellsheimr as a southern region of heat and fire, source of sun, moon, and stars, see SnE 11, 12, 15, 18. For a succinct account in English of the great OHG poem Muspilli, see Bostock 120–34.

48/5 fifls megir: i.e. giants; cf. OE fiflcyn (Beowulf 104). Probably here fifls = Muspellz.

48/7–8 bróðir Býleipz: well identified as Loki by the kenning for Hel as 'daughter of the brother of Býleistr' (Ytal 31; cf. also Hyndl 40). I have kept the R form Býleipz (supported only by U) because -leiptr, 'lightning', is a meaningful word in the context of Loki/Loptr ('air', 'sky'), and -leistr, 'foot of a sock' (cf. leistabrækr, 'breeches fitted with socks') has few native cognates (Gothic laistjan, 'to follow'; OE lāst, 'footprint, -step', etc.). The sense suggested for Býleistr is 'one who makes his way over homesteads', i.e. the air, i.e. Loptr: so, just another name for Loki (LP, SN). The 'lightning of homes' could conventionally signify 'fire', an element that pairs well with Loptr (Logi, 'Flame', is Loki's rival in SnE 54: an alter ego who out-eats him). If this is the correct reading of Býleiptr, then it is of poetic contextual significance that Loki should here be linked with all-consuming fire. Býleiptr as a kenning can be double-edged: fire will make homes bright; it is also one of the commonest and swiftest ways of destroying them—like lightning. If Býleipz has some such meaning then the mention of Loki twice in the stanza is not necessarily otiose.

49/1–2 ásom... álfom: the antiquity of this formula is suggested by the echo of it in an OE charm (Storms 142) against the 'shots' of malign beings: Gif hit wære ēsa gescot, oððe hit wære ylfa gescot... 'Were it shot of *Ese, or shot of elves...'. We can only conjecture that the álfar and æsir became associated, dwelling together in divine halls (Lks 2, 30), because both terms were popularly used of the spirits of victorious, prosperous kings or ancestors of a tribe or region. The heathen in Norway came to worship their great men as álfar much, perhaps, as the Goths came to worship their leaders as Ansis (see commentary to 7/1; AR § 184; Flat ii. 6–9 for the Pátrr Óláfs Geirstaðaálfs; Vkv Introd ii. c for the link between álfar, the supernatural smiths, and Álfheimr).

49/7 veggbergs vísir, 'knowing well the mountain rock (berg) that formed the wall (vegg-) of their home', i.e. knowing well that a terrible change in it was happening.

50/1 Surtr: a folk-legendary fire-demon and giant who will cause the final conflagration of the earth (Surtalogi, 'Surti's flame', Vafþ 50, 51, with a by-form of his name). Surtr probably signifies 'black', as an ablaut variant of Svartr.

50/3–4 skínn — valtiva: af sverði, i.e. from Freyr's sword, which fought 'of itself against the giants' race' (Skm 8). The sword is the symbol of Freyr's power to defeat the giant forces of death when every night, as the sun, he descends into the underworld (Skm Introd iii). That this sword is now wielded by Surtr implies that the heill of the gods has left them, they are vulnerable to death. That sól valtiva shines from this sword identifies it as Freyr's sword, since his sword was the symbol of his conquering sun. That his sun should be identified as that of the 'gods of the slain' refers, I suggest, to the power of the gods' sun to ensure the life after death of the slain, as its daily rising showed that it could do. Only twice is valtiívar used in Vsp, the second time in 59/7, where Baldr and Høðr are called vés valtiívar, 'the sanctuary's gods of the slain': here the implication that the 'gods of the slain' are the gods who will restore the life of the slain would be particularly fitting.

The problem remains: how did Surtr get possession of Freyr's sword? Loki (Lks 42) mockingly says that Freyr gave it to the giants as the price of Gerðr, but neither Skm nor any other ON source (SnE 41 depends on Lks) corroborates this. The nearest analogue to Loki's version of the story is Irish, and it does concern the conflict between two sun-gods, the one superseding the other (as one might say that Surtr superseded Freyr), and a girl—the earth-bride—is the prize. The old sun-god (Curoi) has abducted the girl (Blathnat, 'Little Flower'). She loves the young sun-god (Cuchulainn), and, learning that Curoi's life depends upon his sword, she steals it and gives to Cuchulainn, who kills him (I am dependent here upon the only work I know which attempts to document variants of the seasonal combat in medieval sources, that of Loomis, esp. chs. 2, 4, and 5; a fresh study by a Celticist would be valuable to Norse scholars). The only motif in the Irish story that is relevant to Vsp is that of the passing of the solar sword out of the hands of the dying sun-god into the hands of the rising sun-god. This a poet could use, reversing the optimism of the seasonal combat so that it is death who wins, not life, at Ragnarök. No romantic element, as in the seasonal combat, survives in traditions of Freyr's fight with Beli (see commentary to 51/5), but the romantic element does survive in the tradition of his sacred marriage (Skm). When Loki accuses Freyr of giving his sword for Gerðr (Lks 42), he diverts a seasonal combat motif—change of owner of the solar sword, so that the new owner can win the bride—into the area of the sacred marriage, where the sword has no traditional role. In Lks we are dealing with a synthetic fiction imposing the exchange of sword-ownership from the seasonal combat of suns upon the sun's sacred marriage, a fiction elaborated for the sake of satire against the gods, and we need look for no other source for it than Lks or its antecedents.

50/6 en gífr rata: I would interpret this in the light of the vision of Þorhallr spámaðr, just before the missionary voyage of Þangbrandr. Þorhallr wakes one morning and smiles. Síðu-Hallr asks: 'Hví brosir þú nú?' Þorhallr answers: 'At því brosi ek, at margr höll opnaz ok hvert kvikvendi býr sinn bagga bæði smá ok stór ok gera fardaga'. Þorhallr has seen that 'many a hill is opening and every living thing is preparing its luggage and both little and large are moving house'; Óláfs Saga Tryggvasonar in mesta II. 150; Flat I. 421. The heathen beings inside the hills, dwarfs and trolls, are moving out before Christianity comes, as they would before an earthquake (see Holtsmark (a), 62). The moving-out of the trollwives parallels that of the warriors in the next line. This is preferable to reading hrata (i.e. trollwives topple from the crags).

51 This stanza is discussed in Vsp Introd III. c. Problem III (i) (c).

51/1 Hlinar: a name for Frigg found only here in poetic texts, but frequent in kennings for 'woman'. In SnE 39 Hlin is presented as a minor goddess who is appointed by Frigg to watch over men she wishes to guard from danger (this relies upon an etymological link between Hlin and hlein, 'peaceful refuge', vb. hleina, 'to have peace and security'; Fritzner s.vv. hlein, hleina; AEW s.vv. hlein, Hlin). There is probably a tragic irony implied in the use here of Hlin for Frigg, in that she was unable to protect either son or husband.

51/5 bani Belia: in Haustr 18 Þórr is called the fiðrþillir . . . bólverðungar Belja, 'life-destroyer of the evil troop of Beli [i.e. of giants]'. So Beli is used as a giant-heiti. Freyr is called Belja dolgr, 'Beli's foe', in Hál 10 in a kenning (probably) for Hálogaland as the útrpst, 'out-lying territory', of Freyr. The name Beli would seem to be the masc. of belja, 'cow' (commonest in ModIcel; cf. belja, 'to bellow'). I suggest that Freyr's fight with Beli was archaically conceived as a ritual symbolic combat, fitting for a fertility 'lord', enacting a beast fight for sovereignty of the tribe, or herd. In SnE 41 Freyr is said to have killed Beli with a stag's horn. Stags too have their seasonal combats ('playing the little stag'—cervulum facere—was condemned as a sacrilege in very early Church decrees; AR § 257). The simplicity of the 'natural' combat of bull v. bull and stag v. stag would seem to have been diversified by interloan from one traditional pageant to another. The age-old motif of divine killing by horn or tusk shows great variety (see AR § 462). Freyr's alter ego Frotho was, according to Saxo, killed by the horns of a sea-cow; according to Skjöldunga Saga, by the antlers of a stag. That Freyr's ancient ritual adversary was a bull (rather than a straightforward giant) may have come corroboration from a Norwegian folktale (cited by Davidson 127–8 from Christensen xxxi, 55–6), in which a 'blessed isle', Útrpst, located off Lofoten, Hálogaland, (cf. Hál 10 cited above) is visited by a farmer from the mainland to pursue a strange bull who is luring away his cows (a modern variant of the combat for the herd). Freyr's stag's horn relates to a beast-battle of great deadliness. Dr Gad Rausing tells me 'it is not too rare to find elk and red deer killed in such duels . . . I have found the remains both of red deer and of elk, stabbed through the lungs by their fellows' (see Brehm 80, 92, 105, 139, 140).

51/8 angan: see commentary to 22/7.

52 This stanza is discussed in Vsp Introd III. c. Problem III (i) (c). In Vafþ 53 Víðarr 'will cleave' the wolf's jaws, i.e. cut or tear them apart. In Vsp it would seem that he is driving his sword either down the throat of the wolf through the gaping jaws, or, more realistically, into the entry at the base of the throat beneath the jaws, as in boar-hunting. So in Sir Gawain 1592–4, Bertilak takes good aim as the boar crashes upon him and steadily places his blade in the 'slot' in the direct line to the heart—Hit hym vp to þe hult [hilt], þat þe hert [heart] schyndered [burst asunder]. Víðarr is always silent; AR § 514 relates this characteristic to an initiation custom of silence before an act of vengeance. The same social isolation is suggested by Víðarr's overgrown land (Grím 17), untrodden by the visits of friends (cf. Háv 119). At Ægir's feast Víðarr plays his silent role, Lks 10. The avenging half-brothers, Víðarr and Váli (Vsp 32–3) will live again to inhabit the holy places of the gods when Surtr's fire has burned itself out (Vafþ 51). See also SnE 72–3.

52/5 Hveðrungr: a name for Loki (Hveðrungrs mæ is Hel, Ytal 32); in pulur a name for 'giant' and for Óðinn, LP; probably related etymologically to OE terms for the violence and noise of wind and sea, hwaðerian, hwoðerian, 'to be tumultuous', hwoðerung, 'harsh grinding noise' (see BT Suppl. s.vv., replacing the older cited forms hweoðrian, hweoðrung in BT and Grein, who, s.v. hweoðu, 'aura', adduces relationship with Gothic hwapjan, 'to foam'; note also EDD s.v. whither vb., the variants w(h)ether, w(h)uther, 'to bluster, rage' (of wind), 'to bellow' (of cattle), 'to rush', etc.). Though de Vries, AEW s.v. hviða, 'gust of wind' (cf. hviðuðr, the name for wind in Hel, Alv 20/6) rejects any connection of hviðr with Hveðrungr (without giving good reasons), there was a family of Gmc words describing the roaring wildness of wind and sea to which Hveðrungr could well belong. Most probably it was another elemental name for Loki/Loptr.

53 This stanza and its variant readings are discussed in Vsp Introd III. c. Problem III (i) (c).

53/2, 10 mogr Hlǫðyniar . . . Fiorgyniar burr: the emphasis upon Þórr's mother, the earth, is deliberate here, as men and Þórr are leaving that heimstǫð for ever. Hlǫðyn (LP s.v.) is probably to be identified with Hludana, a Gmc (?earth-)goddess of the Lower Rhine, named in five inscriptions from the second and third centuries AD (AR § 546; the etymology of the name is hard to determine). Fiorgyn's name is a (rare) heiti for 'earth' (LP s.v.); the forms of her name in Gothic, OHG, OE signify 'mountain' (AEW s.v. for valuable discussion).

53/6 véorr: as a Þórr-name in Hym 11, 17 (possibly taken from Vsp). Þórr is defender of Miðgarðr against the giants (cf. Hárþ 23). Miðgarðr is called alda vé, 'holy shrine, sanctuary, of mankind' in Háv 107. I take véorr (cf. Véuðr in pulur for Þórr, LP) to mean 'one who is linked to the vé of Miðgarðr as defender, guardian' (DH, SN), though the formation is obscure.

53/11 neppr frá naðri: it is possible that only R reads frá; H is here illegible; of the SnE MSS. SR reads at, T [nepr]ar (ar being probably an error for at), U does not have the stanza, W reads af (I suspect because the scribe of W knew the text of H before it was damaged). The idiom 'to go from—ganga af—a slain foe' is elsewhere recorded from the 10 c. poet Gopþormr sindri's Hákonardrápa: Þar gekk Njǫrðr af Níðei . . . vápnunduðum, 'There the warrior—Njǫrðr of the shield's uproar (battle)—strode from the weapon-wounded (dead) adversary—the Njǫrðr of the broad shields' stream (blood)'; Hkr I. 174, Skjald B I. 56; LP s.vv. af 4, 2. ganga 5. I have not found ganga frá with the same usage in verse. See Vsp Introd III. c. Problem V (ii) (c).

neppr: a rare word, probably also in Reg 8: níðia stríð ónept [MS. 'v nept'], 'kinsmen's strife unfailing, unceasing' (see UD (a)). Fjǫrneppr, 'life-failing', 'short-lived', occurs in a lausavísa attributed to Þormóðr (Fóst 234–5, Skjald B I. 261; the interpretations differ).

53/12 níðs ókviðnom: for me the most difficult line in the poem. Níð implies a deliberate act of hatred, envy, slander, denigration; does the fact that it is directed against a god, miðgarz véorr, also make it a 'sacrilege' (at least in the eyes of Þórr's people)? Níðask á trú sinni is to dishonour, deny one's faith (Fritzner s.v. níða). It is also possible that the term níð bears an allusion to the spewing of poison upon Þórr, which Snorri describes: Þá fellr hann dauðr til jarðar fyrir eitri því er ormrinn blæss á hann, 'Then he falls to earth dead because of the poison the serpent breathes at him' (SnE 72; see JH I. 46). Beowulf dies of the dragon's poison—him on bréostum . . . wēoll . . . attor on innan, 'in his breast the poison seethed within'. For him the dragon was a níðgæst, 'malicious visitant' (Beowulf 2699, 2714–15). Bragi reminds us that the writhing Jǫrmungandr is poisonous when Þórr hooks him, Ragnðr 18. Poison and enmity are ancient associates (see Fritzner s.vv. eitri § 2, eitra vb., eitrblandinn § 2). I have kept the translation of níðs general—'vile act'—to cover all possibilities (Almqvist (a) I. 39, 46–7 does not venture a more definite rendering. On the concept of níð see his ch. 1).

ókviðnom: dat. sg. of ókviðinn, 'unshrinking', 'unlamenting'; there may be a hint of litotes here, that the serpent had approached the killing with positive pleasure (like Grendel: nō mearn fore, / fæhðe ond fyrene, Beowulf 134–5) as well as reckless hatred.

54/5–6 eimi við aldrnara: eimi, 'fumes from fire and hot ashes' (in Faroese 'hot ashes'), suggests volcanic eruption: choking vapours and ash killing the flames, or gushing out upon the flames, would seem to be a fine natural description. I take aldrnara as a backward look at fire as a primary need of man (Eldr er beztr / með ýta sonom / ok sólar syn, 'Fire is the best of things among the sons of men, and the sight of the sun', Háv 68), about to be overwhelmed by fire as a monster of destruction (as Freyr by Surtr, 50–1). It seems improbable that aldrnari should refer to the world tree, whose role in the poem as a measurer, a time-keeper, ends with its groan of age in 45.

aldrnara occurs only here and, with eimr, as a heiti for 'fire' in Pulur IV pp (Skjald B I. 674–5). Ealdorneru, feorhneru, lifneru, 'saving of life' are not uncommon in OE verse (see Grein s.vv.).

54/7 hiti: the use of 'heat' (rather than 'flame', cf. Háv 152: hávan loga; Am 15: hryti hár logi; Vpls 49, st. 22: nam . . . hár logi / við himni gnæfa) brings the volcanic reality closer: one can see flame from a distance.

57, 58 The textual comparisons in Vsp Introd III. c. Problem III (ii) (b) are also of stylistic interest.

57/7 Fimbultýs: the name occurs only here, but Óðinn is called Fimbulbulr, 'Mighty Sage', in Háv 80, 142 (when he designed runes), and the magically potent songs he learnt from his maternal uncle were fimbullióð, Háv 140. The great winter at the end of the world is the Fimbulvetr. The term fimbul conveys size, power, and the sense of the supernatural that may accompany these (though not in fimbulkambi, 'great blockhead', Háv 103). Fífl, 'giant' and Fimbull are variants of the same stem (AEW s.v. fífl).

60/1 Hænir: etymologically Hænir is most readily connected with hani, 'cock', hæna, 'hen', hæns, 'poultry', and so with Latin cano, 'I sing'. In Indian ritual texts one of the officiating priests at a sacrifice is the 'Singer of the Most High', Udgātṛ. Coomaraswamy notes ((a) 49–52, esp. 49, n. 12): 'udgātṛ could be rendered, not inaptly, by "chanticleer". The Buddha's teaching is actually likened to the crowing of a cock.' The cock is 'the awakener', the bird of the sun. The Udgātṛ, the singing priest, acts as 'godfather', first, at a man's natural birth; secondly, at his 'second birth', when, as a sacrificer, after the compulsory initiation, he rises from the initiatory death; and thirdly, when he 'dies and is laid on the pyre, to be reborn thence for the third and last time. In all three of these dangerous transitions from death to life it is the Udgātṛ . . . that "carries him over death" and effects his rebirth.' In the third instance he effects his rebirth in the world beyond, "making him thrive in those (states of being) to which he is born". In Vsp 60 it would seem that Hænir is placed as a priest presiding over the 'dangerous transitions from death to life' with the return of the Æsir to Iðavöllum. He finds out by lot where the home of the two gods' sons should be in the new world, just as he was in attendance at the transitional 'birth' of Askr and Embla (18) into Miðgarðr. On Hænir as a cock, see Holtsmark (b), 51–3.

60/2 hlautvið kíosa: Hænir is picking out the piece of wood, the lot, whose marking he will interpret and which will determine his guidance of the gods. De Vries notes (AR § 288) that hlaut primarily means the 'lot' (deriving from hljóta, 'to cast lots') and only secondarily the sprinkled sacrificial blood alternatively used for divination, for which hlauteinar were the sprinkling implements (Eyrb 9, ch. 4; Hym 1/5–6).

60/3–5 ok burir — viðan: because we are told that the sons of two brothers (I assume Baldr and Höðr) will now byggja, 'inhabit', the sky, I assume that Hænir's lot-casting was to determine their dwelling-site. That there were superstitions about the choice of ground for a dwelling is suggested by Ögmundr's difficulty (Korm 205, ch. 2); the measuring rod for the ground shrivelled three times when it was tried. This was a sign that the man's circumstances would not prosper should he build there. The suggestion that Hænir is choosing a new world tree to plant in the divine brothers' new tún (Steinsland (a), 146–7) ignores the conventional use of hlaut and kjósa in sortilege and can hardly be accepted.

61/4 Gimlé, 'Fire-Lee or -Shelter', not found elsewhere, was a name probably devised by the poet or his circle to express the safety of this blessed hall from both Surtalogi and the flames of the Christian hell. See Vsp Introd iv Excursus (iv).

62 H I reject the stanza basically on the grounds that it is saying in overt Christian terms what the poet has already subtly expressed in 61, 62. Von See offers even stronger arguments on the grounds that 'der Gedanke des eschatologischen

Richters der nordischen Mythologie fremd ist. Die berühmte Völuspá-Str. 65 [i.e. my 62 H], die diesen Gedanken zuerst ausspricht, ist wohl nicht einmal ein spätheidnisches oder synkretistisches, sondern ein rein christliches Produkt' ((c), 122, with further reference in n. 77). Steinsland's spirited attempt to retain 62 H as a pre-Christian part of Vsp is not supported by extant pre-Christian evidence ((d), 335–48). See Vsp Introd iii. c. Problem VI (v).

62 On the last stanza of the poem see Vsp Introd ii ad loc.; also UD (j) 14–15.

62/4 Niðafjallom: cf. Niðavöllum, 36/2. There may be some significance in these interlunar landscapes which I have not understood. I have treated them simply as a deep underworld niðri, never visited by the moon (AEW s.v. nið; OE nið, 'abyss', seems to occur once, Christ and Satan 631–2: scūfað tō grunde / in þæt nearwe nið (see ASPR 1 n.); in Genesis 775 read helle-nið).

62/5 Berr sér í fiððrom: this is a very rare image. The late Otto Pächt assured me that he knew of no representation of a dragon bearing bodies in its wings.

62/8 sökkvaz: cf. Helr 14/8: sökstu, gýgiarkyn! 'Sink down, you giantess seed!'

BALDRS DRAUMAR

- 1 Senn vóru æsir
allir á þingi
ok ásynior
allar á máli, ok um þat réðu
ríkir tívar, hví væri Baldr ballir draumar.
- 2 Upp reis Óðinn,
aldinn gautr,
ok hann á Sleipni
spöul um lagði.
Reið hann niðr þaðan Niflheliar til,
mætti hann hvelpi,
þeim er ór Helium kom.
- 3 Sá var blóðugr
um brióst framan, ok galdrs fœður
gó um lengi.
Fram reið Óðinn, foldvegr dunði,
hann kom at hávu Heliar ranni.
- 4 Þá reið Óðinn
fyr austan dyrr, þar er hann vissi
völu leiði.
Nam hann vittugri

At once the Æsir were all in council and the Ásynior
all talking,
and they gave their opinions,
powerful deities,
as to why Baldr had obdurate dreams.

Up rose Óðinn,
aged god of sacrifice,
and on Sleipnir
he placed the saddle.
He rode down from there to Deep Hel's mist, he met a hound-whelp that came out of Hel.

It was bloody down the front of its breast, and round wizardry's father went barking long.
Ahead rode Óðinn,
the earthen path echoed,
he came to the high hall of Hel.

Then Óðinn rode east of the door, to where he knew
was the völva's grave.
He began over the wise witch

valgaldr kveða,
unz nauðig reis,
nás orð um kvað:

to speak spells for the dead,
until grudging she rose,
gave a corpse's words utterance:

- 5 'Hvat er manna þat,
mér ókunnra,
er mér hefir aukit
erfit[t] sinni?
Var ek snivin snióvi ok slegin regni
ok drifin döggu.
Dauð var ek lengi.'

'What man is that,
unknown to me,
who has overburdened me
with an arduous journey?
I was snowed on with snow and smitten by rain and drenched with dew.
I have long been dead.'

- 6 'Vegtamr ek heiti, sonr em ek Valtams.
Segðu mér ór Helium
—ek man ór heimi;
hveim eru bekkir
baugum sánir, flet fagrliga
fló[u]ð gulli?'

'Way Tamed I am called,
I am son of Slaughter Tamed.
Tell me news from Hel
—I remember that from the world:
for whom are the benches draped with ring-mail, and the dais resplendently
rippling with gold?'

- 7 'Hér stendr Baldr of brugginn miðr,
skírar veigar,
liggr skiðldr yfir—
.
en ásmegir
í ofvæni.
Nauðug sagðak,
nú mun ek þegia.'

'Here stays for Baldr
the mead brewed, gleaming goblets,
a shield covers the mead—
.
but the Æsir's sons [are] in great apprehension.
Unwilling I have spoken,
now I shall keep silent.'

- 8 'Þegiattu, völvu,
þik vil ek fregna,
unz alkunna—
vil ek enn vita:
hverr man Baldr
at bana verða
ok Óðins son
aldri ræna?'

'Do not be silent, völva,
I wish to seek answers from you,
until all is known—
I want to know still:
who will become Baldr's slayer
and rob the life
from Óðinn's son?'

5/4 erfit[t] æfit A

6/8 flóuð] flöp with a curl over þ (i.e. flóðr, without meaning) A

For a brief note on the relationship of Baldrs Draumar and Völuspá and bibliographical reference see the commentary to Vsp 28/5–6.

Baldrs Draumar is preserved only in AM 748 I 4^{to} (A) fol. 1–2. I supply MS. readings where the text requires obvious emendation.

2/2 aldinn] as 13/4; allða A 3/4 gó um] golv A

- 9 'Hǫðr berr hávan
hróðrbarm þiníg, hann man Baldri
at bana verða
ok Óðins son
aldri ræna.
Nauðug sagðak,
nú mun ek þegia.'
- 10 'Þegiattu, vǫlva,
þik vil ek fregna,
unz alkunna,
vil ek enn vita:
hverr man heipt Heði
hefnt of vinna eða Baldrs bana á bál vega?'
- 11 'Rindr berr [Vála]
í vestrslum;
sá man Óðins sonr einnættir vega,
hǫnd um þvær[a],
né hǫfuð kembir,
áðr á bál um berr
Baldrs andskota.
Nauðug sagðak,
nú mun ek þegia.'
- 12 'Þegiattu, vǫlva,
þik vil ek fregna,
unz alkunna,
vil ek enn vita:
hverjar ro þær meýiar
er at muni gráta ok á himin verpa hálsa skautum?'
- 13 'Ertattu Vegtamr, sem ek hugða,
heldr ertu Óðinn,
aldinn gautr!'
- 'Hǫðr will bear a high[-growing] glorious tree[-frond] to the place, he will become Baldr's slayer
and rob the life
from Óðinn's son.
Unwilling I have spoken,
now I shall be silent.'
- 'Do not be silent, vǫlva,
I wish to seek answers from you,
until all is known—
I want to know still:
who will wreak vengeance on Hǫðr for this villainy and carry Baldr's killer on to the pyre?'
- 'Rindr will bear Váli
in western halls;
that son of Óðinn will kill when one night old—he will not wash hand,
nor comb head,
before he bears to the pyre
Baldr's adversary.
Unwilling I have spoken,
now I shall be silent.'
- 'Do not be silent, vǫlva,
I wish to seek answers from you,
until all is known—
I want to know still:
who are those maidens who weep for their pleasure, and fling to the sky
the scarves on their necks?'
- 'You are not Way Tamed,
as I thought,
rather are you Óðinn,
aged god of sacrifice!'

- 'Ertattu vǫlva,
né vís kona,
heldr ertu þriggia
þursa móðir!'
- 14 'Heim ríð þú, Óðinn,
ok ver hróðigr!
Svá komit manna
meirr aptr á vit, er lauss Loki
líðr ór þöndum ok ragnarøk riúfendr koma.'
- 'You are no vǫlva
nor wise woman,
rather are you the mother of three monsters!'
- 'Ride home, Óðinn, and exult!
No one will come back again on such a visit, when Loki, freed, moves from his bonds and Ragnarøk arrives with ruin.'

COMMENTARY ON THE TEXT

6/7 flet I have taken as pl.; see LP s.v.

7/3 liggr skiþldr yfir: the mead is covered against any evil eye that might blight it (SG; cf. Bysk 1. 79, line 8).

7/5–6 en — ofvæni: two preceding lines may have been lost here (cf. the ten-line stanza 11). SG suggest that the lost lines probably noted the happy anticipation of the inhabitants of Hel, in contrast to the Æsir's fearful anxiety, at the thought of Baldr's death.

9/1–2 hávan hróðrbarm: I suggest that the poet is attempting to render phrases in Vsp 31/6 and 32/1–2 that he has not correctly understood. From vþlomm hæri, 31/6, he takes the notion that the 'tree' (meiði, 32/1) is 'high', 'tall', interpreting meiðr as equivalent to a growing tree (baðmr/barmr), rather than a piece of a tree that could become a spear. He reads mær, 'slim', (32/2) as mærr, 'glorious', and forms a compound with hróðr, 'glory': hróðrbarm. I have doctored the translation slightly for the reader's sake. The description hávan hróðrbarm, 'high tree of glory', would be conventionally apt for the Cross, but no such thought seems to have been in the poet's mind.

þinig: that is, towards the assembly place where Baldr was killed by him in his blindness (SnE 64).

12/5–8 This riddle resembles others posed by Óðinn elsewhere, to which the answer is 'waves' (Heiðr 40–2). The waves are women (snótir, meyjar, ekkjur, brúðir), often in sorrow (sýrgjandi, sjaldan bliðar), with white hair and white head-dresses. In BDr I take hálsa skautum to be a variation on the hair and head-dresses as the wave-tops, here being wildly tossed up to the heavens to salute a funeral ship—such as Baldr will have—welcoming the dead newcomer with both grief and delight (cf. Hamð 15/4). The curved 'necks' of waves, sometimes with intricate decorations, are portrayed on several of the gravestones on Gotland (see Lindqvist 1 Fig. 77, 81, 104, 107, 128). Skautum could refer to a square of cloth folded as a scarf round the neck (cf. Ríg 16/7), or to a hood or cowl (see Vigfússon s.v. skaut 4). Why this riddle should serve to betray Óðinn's identity is not clear; it does not seem to require an answer that only Óðinn could know (cf. Vafþ 54, 55).

13/7–8 þriggia — móðir: this must be the giantess Angrboða, 'Grief-boder', who bore three monstrous children to Loki: the wolf Fenrir, the world serpent Jormungandr, and Hel, 'Death' (SnE 34, Hyndl 40).

RÍGSPULA

CONTENTS

TEXT AND TRANSLATION	162
INTRODUCTION	174
I. The Genre, Provenance, and Date of the Poem	174
A. The genealogical poem	174
B. The king as crown of the three estates	175
C. The age of the political themes in Rígsþula	178
D. Analogues to the political themes in Rígsþula	179
Theme I: The progress of man	179
(i) Historical patterns	181
(ii) Mythological patterns	182
(iii) Patterns of class portraiture	184
(iv) Outmoded patterns of social theory	185
Theme II: The peripatetic guest and partner of wives: king and god	190
Theme III: The three estates: their origins and their king	195
E. Where and when was Rígsþula composed?	202
II. The Text and Metre of Rígsþula	208
A. The text	208
B. The metre	211
COMMENTARY ON THE TEXT	215

RÍGSPULA

Svá segia menn í fornum sögum at einhverr af ásum, sá er Heimdallr hét, fór ferðar sinnar ok fram með siövarströndu nøkkurri, kom at einum húsabæ ok nefndiz Rígr. Epter þeirri sögu er kvæði þetta.

So it is said in ancient stories, that one of the Æsir, who was called Heimdallr, was going on his way and, following along a seashore, he came to a homestead, and he gave his name as Rígr. This poem is based on that story.

- | | |
|--|---|
| 1 Ár kváðu ganga
grœnar brauter öflgan ok aldin
ás kunnigan,
ramman ok roskvan
Rígr stíganda. | Long ago, they said, walked on green ways
a strong and aged sagacious god, robust and ripe-grown
Rígr, striding. |
| 2 Gekk hann meirr at þat
miðrar brautar.
Kom hann at húsi,
hurð var á gætti,
inn nam at ganga.
Eldr var á gólfi,
híon sátu þar,
hár at arni,
Ái ok Edda

aldinfalda. | On he walked more then
in the middle of the way.
He came to a house,
the door was in the side-niche,
in he stepped.
A fire was on the floor,
man and wife sat there,
white-haired by the hearth, Greatgrandfather and Greatgrandmother
in her old woman's coif. |
| 3 Rígr kunni þeim
ráð at segia. | Rígr was able
to offer advice to them. |

On the MS. preservation of the text see Ríg Introd II. A. A few of the more common features of the orthography of W, as they affect Rígsþula, may be mentioned: 'áá' (or, less often, 'aa') represents á; 'uu' is sometimes used for ú; 'q' is regularly used for q; both æ and æ are written 'æ', except in bæ (prose prologue), written 'bæ'; 'æ' is sometimes used for e; 'giæ' is common for gæ; 'lld' is usual for ld; 'f' is frequent for v; a macron is used for n/m; 'ñ' represents nn; 'h' represents hann; 'r' is used for rr; 'h' represents hon, and 'v' voru; superscript abbreviation signs are used for -ar and for -er (always written -er not -ir when not abbreviated; hence -er is used in the text here). Capitals often mark the beginnings of stanzas (they do not occur in 8, 12, 15, 19, 20, 22, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 31, 34, 44, 45, 46, 48); other occurrences are noted.

Prose: line 3 Epter] initial capital W

1/1 Ár] At W

2/8 at arni] af árni W

2/9 Edda] Ellda W

Meirr settiz hann
miðra fletia,
en á hlið hvára
híon salkynna.

More, he seated himself
in the middle of the bench,
and at either side of him
the man and wife of the household.

- 4 Þá tók Edda
økkvinn [h]leif,
þungan ok þykkan,
þrunginn sáðum.
Bar hón meirr at þat
miðra skutla.
Soð var í bolla,
setti á biðð.

Then Greatgrandmother took a gross loaf,
weighty and thick,
wedged with grains.
More, she brought it then
in the middle of the dishes.
Broth was in the bowl,
she set that on the table.

Reis hann upp þaðar,
réðz at sofna.

Up he rose from there,
made himself ready to sleep.

- 5 Rígr kunni þeim
ráð at segia.
Meirr lagðiz hann
miðrar rekkju,
en á hlið hvára
híon salkynna.

Rígr was able
to offer advice to them.
More, he laid himself
in the middle of the bed,
and at either side of him
the man and wife of the household.

- 6 Þar var hann at þat
þriár nætr saman.
Gekk hann meirr at þat
miðrar brautar.
Liðu meirr at þat
mánuðr níu.

There he was then
three nights together.
On he walked more then
in the middle of the way.
Time moved on more then
nine months.

- 7 Ióð ól Edda,
íósu vatni.
Hq̄rvi [vafði
hq̄rund]svartan.
[Hq̄fug vóru augu]— héttu Þræl.

Greatgrandmother bore a child,
they sprinkled him with water.
In rough linen she [wrapped]
the black-[skinned] boy.
[Heavy were his eyes]—
they called him Thrall.

- 8 Hann nam at vaxa
ok vel dafna.

He began to grow
and gain strength well.

4/2 økkvinn hleif] q̄kvinnleif W var kálfr soðinn, / krása beztr.
vafði cf. 35/2

4/8 biðð] here follow in W the lines now transferred to 18/7-8:
6/6 níu] ix. W 7/3-5 Hq̄rvi — augu] hq̄rvi svartan W;

- Var þar á höndum hrokkit skinn, kropner knúar, [kartnegl,] fingr digrer—fulligt andlit,
lotr hryggr,
langer hælur.
- 9 Nam hann meirr at þat magns um kosta bast at binda byrðar gørva.
Bar hann heim at þat hrís gerstan dag.
- 10 Þar kom at garði
gengilbeina.
Aurr var á ilium,
armr sólbrunninn,
niðrbiúgt ° nef—
nefindiz Þír.
- 11 Miðra fletia
meirr settiz hón—sat hiá henni
sonr hús[s].
Ræddu ok rýndu,
rekkiu gørðu Præll ok Þír, þrungrin dægr.
- 12 Børn ólu þau,
biuggu ok unðu.
Hygg ek at hétu
Hreimr ok Fiósner,
Klúrr ok Kleggi, Kefser, Fúlner, Drumbr, Digraldi,

There was on his hands wrinkled skin, gnarled knuckles, [scabbed nails,] fingers thick—face unlovely, bent back,
long heels.

He began more then to test his might plaiting bast,
packing burdens.
He carried home then kindling through the cruel day.

There came to the homestead
a gadabout girl.
Soil was on the soles of her feet,
her arm sunburnt,
down-curving her nose—
her name, she said, was Thrallwoman.

In the middle of the bench
more she seated herself—he sat beside her,
the son of the house.
They talked and told secrets,
set up their bed,
Thrall and Thrallwoman, days and nights close-packed.

Children they bred,
had a home and were happy.
I think they were called Bawler and Byreboy, Clump and Clegg, Bedmate, Stinker,
Stump, Stout,

8/6 kartnegl] not in W; see commentary. 10/3 Aurr] QR W (see JH II. 100; LP s.v. ørr)
10/5 nef] er nef W; see commentary. 11/4 húss] huus W

- Drøttr ok Høsver, Lútr ok Leggialdi.
Lögðu garða,
akra tōddu,
unnu at svínun,
geita gættu,
grófu torf.
- 13 Døetr vóru þær
Drumba ok Kumba, Økkvinkálfa
ok Arinnefia, Ysia ok Ambátt, Eikintiasna, Tōtrughypia
ok Trønubeina.
Þaðan eru komnar
þræla ætter.
- 14 Gekk Rígr at þat
réttar brauter.
Kom hann at hōllu,
hurð var á skíði,
inn nam at ganga.
Eldr var á gólfi,
hión sátu þar,
heldu á sýslu.
- 15 Maðr telgði þar
meið til rifiar.
Var skegg skapat,
skor var fyr enni,
skyrtu þrøngva.
Skokkr var á gólfi.
- 16 Sat þar kona,
sveigði rokk,
breiddi faðm,
bió til váðar.
Sveigr var á hōfði,
- Sluggish and Grizzled, Stooper and Longleg.
They fixed fences,
dunged fields,
worked at the pigs,
watched over the goats,
dug the peat.
- The daughters were Stumpy and Dumpy, Bulgingcalves and Eaglenose, Shouter and Servingmaid, Greatgossip, Tatteredcoat
and Craneshanks.
From there have come
the generations of thralls.
- Rígr walked then
by right ways.
He came to a hall,
the door was up, on the lintel,
in he stepped.
A fire was on the floor,
man and wife sat there,
pursued their tasks.
- The man was carving there wood for a weaving-beam.
His beard was trimmed,
over his brow the hair was clipped.
He wore a tunic, close-fitting.
A treadway of timber was on the floor.
- There sat the wife,
swung her distaff,
stretched wide her arms,
prepared to make cloth.
A curving cap was on her head,

14/3 hōllu] supplied in the margin W

16/5 Sveigr] initial capital W

- smokkr var á bringu,
dúkr var á hálsi,
dvergar á þxlum.
Afi ok Amma
áttu hús.
- 17 Rígr kunni þeim
ráð at segja.
[Meirr settiz hann
miðra fletia,
en á hlið hvára
hión salkynna.]
- 18 [Pá tók Amma
iastarhleif,
brattan ok brúnan,
af byggmiplvi.]
[Bar hón meirr at þat
miðra skutla.]
†Var kálfr soðinn, krása beztr.†
- Reis frá borði,
réð[z] at sofna.
- 19 [Rígr kunni þeim
ráð at segja.]
Meirr lagðiz hann
miðrar rekkju,
en á hlið hvára
hión salkynna.
- 20 Þar var hann at þat
þriár nætr saman.
[Gekk hann meirr at þat
miðrar brautar.]
Liðu meirr at þat
mánuðr níu.
- a blouse on her bosom,
a kerchief at her neck,
dwarf-pins at her shoulders.
Grandfather and Grandmother owned the buildings.
- Rígr was able
to offer advice to them.
[More, he seated himself
in the middle of the bench,
and at either side of him
the man and wife of the household.]
- [Then Grandmother took a yeasty loaf,
high-risen and brown,
of barley meal.]
[More, she brought it then
in the middle of the dishes.]
†Boiled veal there was, best of dainties.†
- He rose from the table,
made himself ready to sleep.
- [Rígr was able
to offer advice to them.]
More, he laid himself
in the middle of the bed,
and at either side of him
the man and wife of the household.
- There he was then
three nights together.
[On he walked more then
in the middle of the way.]
Time moved on more then
nine months.

17/3 – 18/8 not here in W; 17/3–6 is repeated from 3/3–6; 18/1–4 is an attempted reconstruction by the editor on the models of 4/1–4 and 31, to illustrate the difficulties involved; 18/5–6 is repeated from 4/5–6; 18/7–8 is transferred from 4/9–10 in W 18/10 réðz] reð W; see Ríg Introd II. A. 19/1–2 Rígr — segja] not here in W; repeated from 5/1–2 20/3–4 Gekk — brautar] not here in W; repeated from 2/1–2, 6/3–4 20/6 níu] ix W

- 21 Ióðól Amma,
íósu vatni,
kølluðu Karl.
Kona sveip rípti
rauðan ok rióðan.
Riðuðu augu.
- 22 Hann nam at vaxa
ok vel dafna.
Øxn nam at temia,
arðr at gørva,
hús at timbra
ok hløður smíða, karta at gørva
ok keyra plóg.
- 23 Heim óku þá hanginluklu, geitakyrtilu,
gíptu Karli.
Snør heiter sú,
settiz under rípti.
Biuggu hión,
bauga deildu.
Breiddu blæiur
ok bú gørðu.
- 24 Børn ólu þau,
biuggu ok unðu.
Hét[u] Halr ok Dreng,

Høldr, Þegn ok Smiðr, Breiðr, Bóndi, Bundinskeggi,
Búi ok Boddi,
Brattskeggr ok Seggr.
- 25 Enn hétu svá
øðrum nøfnum
Snót, Brúðr, Svanni,
- Grandmother bore a child,
they sprinkled him with water,
called him Carl.
The wife wrapped in fine linen the red-haired, rosy boy.
His eyes rolled.
- He began to grow
and gain strength well.
Began to train oxen,
make a timber plough,
put up buildings
and construct barns, make carts,
and steer the coulter.
- Home they drove then a dangling-keyed girl, goatskin-kirtled,
married her to Carl.
Daughter-in-law she is called,
took her place beneath the bridal veil.
They dwelt as man and wife, dispensed rings.
They spread their counterpanes and created a household.
- Children they bred,
had a home and were happy.
They were called Goodman and Gallant,
Franklin, Liegeman and Craftsman,
Broad Fellow, Farmer,
Boundbeard,
Husbandman and Householder, Steepeard and Squire.
- And also there were named,
with names of their own,
Lass, Bride, Finedame,

- Svarri, Sprakki,
Flíóð, Sprund ok Víf, Feima, Ristill.
Þaðan eru komnar
karla ætter.
- 26 Gekk Rígr at þat
réttar brauter.
Kom hann at sal,
suðr horfðu dyrr.
Var hurð hnigin.
Hringr var í gætti.
- 27 Gekk hann inn at þat.
Gólf var strát.
Sátu hión,
sáz í augu,
Faðer ok Móðer
fingrum at leika.
- 28 Sat húsgumi
ok sneri streng,
álm of bendi,
qrvar skepti, en húskona
hugði at qrmum,
strauk of ripti,
sterti ermar.
- 29 Keisti fald, kinga var á bringu—
síðar slæður, serk bláfán—
brún biartari, brióst líósara,
háls hvítari
hreinni miðllu.
- 30 Rígr kunni þeim
ráð at segia.
- Damsel, Dainty,
Mistress, Madam and Matron, Shymiss, Sharpmiss.
From there have come
the generations of carls.
- Rígr walked then
by right ways.
He came to a manor,
the entrance faced south.
The door was taken down.
The handle-ring was in the side-niche.
- He walked in then.
The floor was strewn.
Man and wife sat there,
gazed in each other's eyes,
Father and Mother
at finger-play.
- The master of the house sat and twined a bowstring, arched a bow of elm,
set shafts to arrows,
while the mistress of the house studied her arms, stroked the fine linen,
tightened the sleeves.
- High curved her head-dress,
a coin-brooch was at her bosom,
a trailing robe she wore,
a bodice blue-dyed—
her eyebrow brighter, breast fairer,
throat whiter
than pure driven snow.
- Rígr was able
to offer advice to them.

26/1 at þat] þaðan W stráat for the metre.

26/3 hann] 'hann' W

27/2 strát] straað W (aa = á) ? read

- Meirr settiz hann
miðra fletia,
en á hlið hvára
hión salkynna.
- 31 Þá tók Móðer
merkta duk,
hvítan af hqrvi,
hulði bióð.
Hón tók at þat
hleifa þunna,
hvíta af hveiti,
ok hulði duk.
- 32 Fram færði hón †fulla† skutla,
silfri varða, [setti] á bióð:
fán[g] ok fleski
ok fugla steikta.
Vín var í kqnnu,
varðer kálkar.
Drukku ok dæmðu,
dagr var á sinnum.
- †Reis Rígr at þat,
réðz at sofna.†
- 33 †Rígr kunni þeim
ráð at segia.†
[Meirr lagði hann
miðrar rekkju,
en á hlið hvára
hión salkynna.]
- 34 Þar var hann at þat
þríar nætr saman.
- More, he seated himself
in the middle of the bench,
and at either side of him
the man and wife of the household.
- Then Mother took a patterned cloth,
white, of thick linen,
covered the table.
Then she took slim loaves,
white, of wheat-flour,
and covered the cloth.
- Out she brought brimful dishes,
silver-mounted,
[set] them on the table:
fresh game and pig's flesh and fowls roasted.
There was wine in a flagon, ornamented goblets.
They drank and discoursed,
the day was passing.
- †Rígr rose then,
made himself ready to sleep.†
- †Rígr was able
to offer advice to them.†
[More, he laid himself
in the middle of the bed,
and at either side of him
the man and wife of the household.]
- There he was then
three nights together.
- 31/3 hqrvi] hqrvi W 32/1 færði] setti W 32/2 fulla skutla] skutla fulla W 32/4 setti] not in W (cf. 32/1) bióð] biqð W 32/5 fang] fáan W (i.e. fán); see commentary.
ok] '7' W 32/11 Reis] initial capital W 32/11-12 †Reis — sofna] Reis Rígr at þat rekkju gærði W. In W these two lines follow 33/1-2. réðz at sofna] repeated from 4/10; see Ríg Introd II. A.
33/1-2 †Rígr — segia] In W these two lines precede 32/11-12. 33/3-6 Meirr — salkynna] not here in W, repeated from 5/3-6 34/2 þríar] .iiij. W

- Gekk hann meirr at þat
miðrar brautar.
Liðu meirr at þat
mánuðr níu.
- 35 Svein ól Móðer,
silki vafði.
Íósu vatni,
Iarl létu heita.
Bleikt var hár, biarter vangar,
øtul vóru augu
sem yrmlingi.
- 36 Upp óx þar
Iarl á fletium—lind nam at skelfa,
leggia strengi,
álm at beygia,
orvar skepta,
flein[um] at fleygia,
frøkkur dýia,
hestum riða,
hundum verpa,
sverðum bregða,
sund at fremia.
- 37 Kom þar ór runni
Rígr gangandi.
Rígr gangandi
rúnar kendi, sitt gaf heiti—
son kveðz eiga.
Þann bað hann eignaz óðalvøllu—
óðalvøllu,
aldnar byggðer.
- 38 Reið hann meirr þaðan
myrkan við,
- On he walked more then
in the middle of the way.
Time moved on more then
nine months.
- Mother bore a boy,
wrapped him in silk.
They sprinkled him with water,
had him named Jarl.
Blond was his hair,
brilliant his cheeks,
baleful were his eyes
as a baby snake's.
- There grew up
Jarl among the benches—began to brandish a shield, fit bowstrings,
bend a bow of elm,
put shafts to arrows,
send spears flying,
shake lances,
ride stallions,
fling hounds at their quarry,
swing swords,
practise swimming.
- There came from the woodland
Rígr walking.
Rígr walking
taught him runes, gave him his own name—
declares he has a son.
That son he bade appropriate ancestral plains—
ancestral plains,
long-dwelt-in countrysides.
- He rode from there more through murky forest,

36/7 fleinum] flein W; cf. Kólfi fleygði 47/3 37/3 Rígr] initial capital W 37/9 óðal-] initial capital W

- hélug fiøll,
unz at høllu kom.
Skapt nam at dýia,
skelfði lind,
hesti hleypti
ok hiorvi brá.
Víg nam at vekia,
vøll nam at rióða,
val nam at fella—
vá til landa.
- 39 Réð hann einn at þat átíán búum.
Auð nam skipta,
øllum veita
meiðmar ok mōsma,
mara svangrifia.
Hringum hreytti,
hió sundr baug.
- 40 Óku ærer
úrgar brauter, kómu at høllu
þar er Herser bió.
Mætti hann miófingrað[r]i, hvíttri ok horskri—
hét [s]ú Erna.
- 41 Báðu hennar
ok heim óku, giptu Iarli—
gekk hón und líni.
Saman biuggu þau
ok sér unðu, ætter ióku
ok aldrs nutu.
- 42 Burr var hinn elzti,
en Barn annat,
- frosty hills,
till he came to a hall.
Began to shake his spear-shaft, brandished his shield,
spurred his stallion and swung his sabre.
Began to wake war,
began to redden the plain,
began to strike down the slain—got lands by fighting.
- Sole lord he was then of eighteen estates.
Began to share out wealth, grant to all treasures and choice gifts, slender-ribbed steeds.
Tossed away rings,
cleft a bracelet in two.
- Envoys drove over dripping roads, came to the hall
where Baron lived.
He met
a slim-fingered girl, white-gleaming and wise—
she was called Erna.
- They asked for her in marriage and drove her home, wedded her to Jarl—
she went beneath the bridal veil.
They made a home together and were happy with their life, increased their kindred and enjoyed their days.
- Boychild was the eldest and Bairn the second,

39/2 búum] buú W (i.e. either disyllabic búum or monosyllabic búm; see JHn. 78) 40/1 Óku]
Okú W 40/6 miófingraðri] -graðri written -g^{ar}ði W 40/8 hét sú] hetu W

- Ióð ok Aðal,
Arfi, Møgr,
Niðr ok Niðjung
—námu leika—
Sonr ok Sveinn
—sund ok tafl.
Kundr hét einn,
Konr var hinn yngsti.
- 43 Upp óxu þar
Iarli borner—hesta tømðu,
hlífar bendu,
skeyti skófu,
skelfðu aska.
- 44 En Konr ungr
kunni rúnar, ævinrúnar
ok aldrúnar.
Meirr kunni hann mönnum biarga,
eggjar deyfa,
ægi lægia.
- 45 Klök nam fugla,
kyrra elda,
sæva ok svefia,
sorger lægia.
.
.
.
.
afl ok eliun
átta manna.
- 46 Hann við Ríg Iarl
rúnar deildi, brögðum beitti
ok betr kunni.
Þá þölaðiz
ok þá eiga gat
- Offspring and High Kind, Heir, Scion,
Kin and Kinsman
—they learned sports—
Son and Stripling
—swimming and chequers.
Nearkin one was named,
Noblekin was the youngest.
- There grew up
the sons born to Jarl—broke in horses, arched bucklers,
smooth-planed arrow-shafts,
brandished spears of ash-wood.
- But young Noblekin had knowledge of runes, runes of eternity,
runes of life.
More, he knew how to deliver the new-born, blunt sword-edges,
allay the ocean.
- He learned the birds' jargon,
how to curb blazing fires,
and make seas untroubled,
allay sorrows.
.
.
.
.
the strength and valour
of eight men.
- With Rígr Jarl
he disputed runes, teased him with tricks
and knew better than he.
Then he got his due and gained the right then

45/2-4 kyrra elda — lægia] See commentary.
viii] W

45/5-6 no lacuna in W

45/8 átta]

- Rígr at heita,
rúnar kunna.
- 47 Reið Konr ungr
kiðr ok skóga,
kólfi fleygði,
kyrði fugla.
- 48 Þá kvað þat kráka,
sat kvisti ein:
'Hvat skaltu, Konr ungr,
kyrra fugla?
Heldr mætti þér hestum ríða, [hiðrum bregða]
ok her fella.
- 49 'Á Danr ok Danpr
dýrar haller, æðra óðal
en ér hafið.
Þeir kunnu vel
kiól[i] at ríða,
egg at kenna,
under riúfa.'
- to be called Rígr,
and have knowledge of runes.
- Young Noblekin rode through scrublands and forests, let fly his bolt,
silenced the birds.
- Then said a crow—
she sat alone on a bough:
'Why must you, young Noblekin, be silencing the birds?
Rather you men might be riding on stallions, [flourishing sabres]
and felling an army.
- 'Danr and Danpr own extravagant halls, more excellent patrimony than you possess.
They are well skilled in coursing a ship, making felt their sword's edge, cleaving wounds!'

46/8 kunna] corrected from kunni W (cf. 44/2) 48/7 hiðrum bregða] not in W
49/4 ér] þer W (cf. 48/5; Noreen § 465 n. 5) 49/6 kióli] kiól W

INTRODUCTION

1. *The Genre, Provenance, and Date of the Poem*A. The genealogical poem

To give honour to princely houses, Norwegian court poets traced the ancestry of their noble patrons back to a very remote past, a time when gods begot men. Þjóðólfr of Hvin, at the end of the ninth century, made a link between an illustrious smákonungr, Rognvaldr of Vestfold, and the line of the Swedish kings, the Ynglingar, who were reputedly descended from the god Yngvi-Freyr.¹ A century later, Eyvindr the Plagiariast did the same service for his lord, Jarl Hákon of Hlaðir, tracing his origins back to a son of Óðinn and the giant's daughter Skaði (a mythological marriage not known outside this genealogy, and perhaps, indeed, devised for the occasion by the poet himself).² These poems, the Ynglingatal and the Háleygjatal, were genealogical fabrications with a political purpose, and, in that respect, comparable with the Christian chronicles of Europe that traced the kings of the Franks and the British back to Trojan Aeneas, himself the son of the goddess Aphrodite.³

To such a genre of political fiction, the poem Rígsþula adds new dimensions: above all, popular dimensions. Here not only kings, but serfs and solid farmers are descended from a god—the same god. And the act of begetting is not a distant allusion, but a lively comedy of immediate events. The king who emerges from this comedy is the first founder of a royal dynasty in Norse lands:⁴ he represents the ultimate stage of the economic, social, political, cultural, and—I suggest—moral evolution of man.

¹ Hkr I. 26–83; Skjald B I. 7–14; CPB I. 244–51. See J. Turville-Petre. Rognvaldr of Vestfold was cousin to Haraldr hárfagri. Baetke (b), 83–5 emphasizes the political purpose of Ytal: 'Stamm-bäume und genealogische Gedichte werden nicht zur Erbauung der Hofgesellschaft verfasst, sie dienen einem sehr realen Zweck, der meist politischer Natur ist. . . . Dass hinter dem Yt[al]. eine politische Tendenz steckt, scheint mir sicher, aber um sie zu bestimmen, müssten wir mehr über Rognvald wissen.'

² Hkr I. 21, 22, 44, 108, 207, 208, 280; Fagrsk 121; SnE 91, 93, 94, 98, 149, 166; Skjald B I. 60–2; CPB I. 252–4. For the best modern edition, based on a fresh examination of all the MSS., with introduction, commentary and English translation, see Davidson 31–159.

³ See Pseudo-Fredegarius, Liber Historiae Francorum I, II (340–3); Nennius, Historia Britonum x, xi; Faral 7 f. (anonymous Historia Britonum), 73 ff. (Geoffrey of Monmouth, Historia Regum Britannie). These Christian authors are not concerned to mention Aeneas' divine mother.

⁴ See commentary to 49/1.

B. The king as crown of the three estates

While, it would seem, the climax of the poem is a genealogical one, the poet of Rígsþula has made his genealogical theme the occasion to play with a multiplicity of mythological motifs in a way that Þjóðólfr and Eyvindr do not. In presenting the divine descent of kings as only one branch of the divine descent of all humanity, Rígsþula joins two ancient myths into one: a myth of Heimdallr and a myth of Óðinn. Heimdallr is progenitor of all mankind in its different estates—meiri ok minni, as the poet of Völuspá says (1). His teaching is of procreation, afforesting the earth with family trees.⁵ Óðinn is ancestor and patron only of aristocratic houses, of earls and kings. His teaching is of power, by wisdom, magic, and war. From the interplay of these two myths, which pull in opposite directions—the one élitist, the other egalitarian—springs the humorous irony of the poem, a social wit that makes it perennially up to date.

The complex theme is presented with ingenious simplicity.⁶ With an airy repetitiveness the poet describes the begetting of the prototypes of the three classes of Norse society: Þræll the serf, Karl the farmer, and Jarl the nobleman. He lets parallel episodes and identical narrative phrases revolve like a merry-go-round; when the merry-go-round stops, we notice change. Progressively we notice the development, out of a chronological situation, of a sociological one. In three different houses, as a guest sharing the marital bed, the god—adopting the pseudonym Rígr, whose significance will soon become apparent—assists in the begetting of three physically different sons upon three human mothers of different age, so that Þræll is an old crone's child, Karl a vigorous middle-aged woman's child, and Jarl the child of a young and dazzling lady, modern in fashion and sentiment.

All three boys thrive prodigiously in their different lives. But, one day, for Jarl, as he practises his noble sports, the merry-go-round changes tune. The god himself approaches him. He teaches him runes, names him with his own name—Rígr—and acknowledges him as his son: son kveðz eiga (37/6). Then he spurs him to win land for himself—other people's land—and this Jarl does, instinctively and necessarily, by war—single-handed.

⁵ See Tolley (a), 232–43 ('The Tree and Man'); UD (i), 666–9. To Óðinn, too, arboreal features cling: his mother was Bestla, 'Tree-Bark', his uncle Bölþorn, 'Evil Thorn', and the barnstokkr, 'tree-trunk of children' in the Völsungs' hall was in his power (Hunke 68–71; AR § 586). In popular belief the tree was a help in childbirth: Carl Nielsen's mother, when he was about to be born, in heavy birth-pains fastened her arms round a tree and beat her head against the trunk (Nielsen 11).

⁶ This simplicity has sometimes been blamed as illogical or self-contradictory (cf. Meissner (c), 116–17): where does Þir have her origins (10), or Hersir and his daughter (40)? We could point out that the divine spirit of Rígr may have inspired life in many other little cells of humanity around the earth, on innumerable other journeys, but this would introduce a tediousness to the fable that the poet has deliberately avoided. He juxtaposes beginnings and their developments, confident that his audience will appreciate his sleight of hand. On the criticism that Þræll has no master see commentary to 16/10: he exists before his masters.

All three youths acquire a fitting wife. Præll and Karl have many sons and daughters and so become the founders of the generations of þrælar and of karlar. But here, for Jarl, the merry-go-round changes tune again. By his lady wife he has twelve sons (there is no mention of daughters)⁷ and the focus falls upon the youngest, Konr Ungr. Like a fairy-tale youngest son, he is different from his brothers: an eccentric, an intellectual, a mystic even, and a mischievous challenger of the establishment. The science that the god taught his father now blossoms marvellously in him, as if it were 'in his blood'. He has the strength of eight men, but he is a gentle giant, and the war-like sports of his brothers (43/3–6) evidently do not satisfy him. He knows runes that save life and help life (44) and has an ear for the wisdom of the natural world, understanding the chatter of birds—such well-informed and prescient creatures (45/1, 48–9). He is not awed by his father, but challenges him at runes, as if it were a chess game or a wrestling match, and proves that he knows better moves, better tricks, deeper secrets than he—the secrets of peace, perhaps, rather than the secrets of war? So he inherits already—an unusual case of ultimogeniture—from his god-begotten father the two gifts the god had given his son: his own name, Rígr, and his own knowledge of runes.

What can he turn to next? Feeling no pricks of further ambition—deaf to the merry-go-round of the world's progress—this genius roams through bushland and wood aiming bolts at birds. A crow on a branch reproves such aimless delinquency against her own kind, and, being an Odinic bird, and feminine, tries to awake manly shame and aspiration in him: how can he be content with striking birds, when he could be hewing down armies? Does he not know of the great Vikings Danr and Danpr, skilled in seafaring and slaughter, and of their costly residences and ancestral estates far superior to anything Jarl and his family have? (48, 49)

What precise challenge the crow was to utter we do not know, because the next page of the MS. is lost, taking the rest of the poem with it. No doubt, mindful of her own economic interests in war, she would have repeated the advice of the god Rígr to Rígr Jarl: 'Go and win these ancestral estates for yourself' (cf. 37/7–10). What might Rígr Konr Ungr have replied to this? It would be in character for him to say that he neither envied nor wished to fight these superior sea-rovers—he was perfectly happy as he was. But if the crow slyly added: 'Danpr has a wise and lovely daughter, his only heir. Would you not like to win her?' the young man might be moved to action. (One of the promises of Saul, that moved David to fight Goliath, was that the king would give his daughter to the conqueror—and David asked to hear the promise twice; 1 Samuel 17: 23–7.)

⁷ I am assuming that the omission of daughters is deliberate and not a textual error. The poet may not have wished to close the Earl section with a list of girls' names followed by Paðan eru konnar / iarla ættar (cf. 13, 25) just at the moment when he is moving on to suggest that the progeny of iarlar may become kings by exogamy.

But what action might Rígr Konr Ungr take? He might make war on Danr and Danpr: had they had a champion—a berserker perhaps—he might even have overcome him, much as David overcame Goliath, with a single cast of his bird-bolt. The princess might then be offered as a bride to him, bringing with her the land that was to be Denmark. We have other legends of young princes in Scandinavia throwing off their sluggish habits of leisure and taking easily to war, in Offa and in Beowulf.⁸

Yet it might be more in character for Konr Ungr to be quite unlike his father Jarl in this respect, and to scorn war and waste no time on its clumsy brutality, but concentrate more directly on winning the lady. He could repeat the peaceful pattern of his divine grandfather. Travelling like him along grænar brauter and coming like him incognito to an alien hall—whose doors are standing wide open—he could win his princess by ráð—though of a less archaic nature, perhaps, than his grandfather's. So the heiress would be betrothed, by her own will, to the charismatic stranger with the brilliant mind, divinely dispatched to be the archetypal konungr of the Norse-speaking world.⁹

We can see now why the god in the poem assumed the name Rígr when he walked on earth. No other name would be so fitting for him or his purpose, for Rígr means 'king' (in Irish), a fact that would certainly be known to the Norse audience of the poem (see commentary to 1/6). Rígr gives his name to Jarl as his own son, and Konr Ungr wins it as an inheritance—þá þólaðiz / ok þá eiga gat (46/5–6)—from his father Jarl. Konr Ungr now bears two royal names, one given by human baptism, the other given by the god. Rígr expresses the king's god-given right to rule, as the god's heir and deputy, while Konr Ungr, 'Noble Young Scion'—a name we are meant to believe will become the title Konungr—expresses the high worldly rank that his noble human ancestry entitles him to. By the device of the two names of different linguistic origin the humanity and the divinity of the ⁸ See Saxo iv. iv–v (Uffo, i.e. Offa); Beowulf 2183–9. In Stjórn 464, the shepherd-boy David planned to fight Goliath with his sling, þvíat hann hafði vaniz at fleygja til fugla steinum, þá er hann gætti hjarðar, 'because he had trained himself to aim at birds with stones, while he was watching over the flocks'. The possibility that Konr Ungr won the princess without fighting is accepted by Finnur Jónsson (FJ (a), 191) and by Neckel (b), 116, though Jónsson sees no reason why, in that case, Konr Ungr should have won the kingdom (as the genealogies insist he did; see commentary to 49/1). We can only suppose that Dana, like Prýð in Beowulf, held the right to decide. Other critics are mostly agreed that Konr Ungr must have fought. The situation would then resemble that which the dwarf outlines to Ruodlieb (Ruodlieb 548: Fragment xviii): two rich kings, father and son, must be killed by the hero in war before the daughter—heiress can be won. It would not be uncharacteristic if the poet of Rig preferred to diverge from such a story type.

⁹ For the epic theme of the founding of a dynasty through marriage to an heiress who brings a realm as her dowry, see Marchello-Nizia 251–66 (esp. 252–4: 'Femme = Règne').

king—his ‘two bodies’, as later political theology describes them—are very neatly distinguished.¹⁰

C. The age of the political themes in Rígsþula

I have called Rígsþula perennially up to date, and indeed it is difficult to confine it to some particular historical moment in the Old Norse period when it might have been composed.

Scholars are not agreed on where and when to place the making of the poem. Some say the tenth century, a heathen period in most Norse lands: so Axel Olrik (writing in 1907) is convinced that ‘the poem reveals to us the view of life and kingship held at the climax of the Viking Age, the tenth century, a period when Scandinavian and Westerner were about to blend’.¹¹ Einar Ólafur Sveinsson and Jónas Kristjánsson seem inclined to this view. Others—Andreas Heusler, Jan de Vries, Klaus von See—place Rígsþula in the twelfth or thirteenth century, as learned antiquarian speculation on class origins, or contemporary comment on the conflict for the Norwegian throne.¹²

Few Germanic scholars today trust Rígsþula as good evidence for pre-Christian Germanic political thought. Although it embodies in a most distinct form the concept of divinely begotten and divinely guided kingship, it has been left out of account in most recent discussions of Germanic kingship. Höfler expressly dismisses the evidence of Rígsþula. Speaking of the Norse tradition that the god Yngvi-Freyr was ancestor of the Swedish kings, and relating that tradition to Tacitus’ account of Mannus, the human progenitor, son of the god Tuisto,¹³ he emphasizes (I paraphrase) that in the case of both Yngvi and Mannus we have clear traces ¹⁰ See Kantorowicz, esp. ch. 3, ‘Christ-centred Kingship’.

¹¹ Olrik (c), 115–16, English trans. of (b), 56–7. Olrik’s account of Ríg contains many inaccuracies. For a correction of his view that there was an Irish tradition of the begetting of the human estates by a god, see the fine note of Thurneysen in Meissner (c), 116 n. 1.

¹² Sveinsson 291; Kristjánsson 213; Heusler (a), 281; *AL*² II. 127; von See (a). Meissner (c), 129–30, deliberately suspends decision: ‘Wir werden uns mit einer unbestimmten zeitlichen ansetzung der Rígsþula bescheiden müssen, wobei es nicht so sehr darauf ankommt, eine zahl zu nennen, als den kulturstand zu bezeichnen, dem das gedicht entstammt. . . . altes und neues verschmilzt in diesem einzigartigen gedichte.’

¹³ See Höfler 675. His reference to Tacitus is to Germ II. In the same chapter Tacitus notes that ‘some, with the freedom allowed in dealing with antiquarian matters, assert that there were many sons of the god and many names of the race . . . and that these names are genuine and ancient’. The divine descent of men would seem to be a notion to be played with at all times: so Plato was constrained to say (Timaeus 40b): ‘As concerning the other divinities [i.e. the anthropomorphic gods of traditional religion], to know and declare their generation is too high a task for us; we must trust those who have declared it in former times: being, as they said, descendants of gods, they must, no doubt, have had certain knowledge of their own ancestors’ (see Cornford 138–9). Most valuable and judicious surveys of work in the field are given by McTurk (a) (to 1974) and (c) (to 1994). Also outstandingly helpful is Binchy.

of a tradition of divine descent going back more than a thousand years. So long a survival indicates how seriously such traditions were taken. Essentially, these traditions affirm that the kings, as well as their entire peoples, believed that they bore something of divine substance in themselves, and that they could pass this on to their descendants—a conception obviously fundamental to the way in which such cultures would judge and value themselves, to their ‘anthropology’ and intellectual climate. In a community sharing this bond with the god, the kings appear as primi inter pares—particularly near to the divine origin. Presumably, if people thought about it more closely, this primacy was imagined on analogy with primogeniture. Yet speculations of this kind are not extant—for the Eddic Rígsþula is rather to be regarded as a poetic confection (Kunstdichtung) than as a direct expression of belief.

Yet if we bear in mind that so much of our evidence for Germanic notions about the origins of the human tribes and their kings comes from poetic sources—Tacitus himself tells us that his story of Mannus was derived from ancient songs, ‘for that is the only form of chronicle’ the ancient Germans had—then it would seem to be illogical to value the testimony of Tacitus and dismiss that of Rígsþula on the grounds that it is only a poem. Precisely because it is a poem—extant, when Tacitus’ sources are not—we may be able to use it to identify and understand the “‘anthropology” and intellectual climate’ of its composition. For so succinct and seemingly light a poem, the burden of themes that Rígsþula carries is quite astonishing. If we examine the analogues that we can find for these themes, and attempt to reconstitute, as it were, the poet’s inherited material, then we may throw some light on his poem’s historical origins.

D. Analogues to the political themes in Rígsþula

Theme I: The progress of man

Rígsþula offers a swift charade of social evolution. To underline the accelerating growth of his theme, the poet makes his key word meirr, ‘more’. Each dwelling the god comes to is finer than the last, each pair of parents richer, each offspring more masterful.

In the first dwelling (hús) a white-haired couple sit by the hearth, doing nothing, in the manner of the very old. These are the ancestors, Great-grandfather and Great-grandmother. Their bare life is sketched with a minimum of words—the hearth, the white hair, and the touch of decorum in the old woman’s covered head. Their food is plain: broth and a coarse-ground loaf. The son the old woman bears has, even as a boy, all the features of age. The description that the poet, respectfully, did not give of the parents is lavished on the son: the wrinkled hands, the knotted knuckles, the back bent with labour—as well as the unrefined features and fingers of early, unpolished man. But Þræll has Rígr's new-born life in him, and by his obsessive labour he keeps the family hearth warm—gathering brushwood all day. Þræll's own children—lumpish, gawky, and loud—are as vigorous as he, and, as there are more of them, their skills multiply the more they work—fencing, manuring, tending pigs and goats, digging peat—more fuel for their growing hearth.

In the second dwelling (hóll) a neat, industrious couple are sitting, he carpentering, she cloth-making: Grandfather and Grandmother, in the prime of life. The red-haired, rosy boy that Grandmother bears leads a life of greater enterprise than Þræll and his kin—harnessing oxen, making ploughs, building wagons, to serve his harvests. His sons' names show the dignified and efficient society that they have created, broad-shouldered house-owners with impressive beards and capable hands. His daughters' names show pride in marital status and a certain independence of mind, a freedom to develop as they will—brisk, quick-tongued, modest, or vain—a lively range of middle-class girls.

In the third dwelling (salr) that the god enters, a leisurely couple sit gazing blissfully into each other's eyes. He perfects his weapons, she her dress—pulling tight the sleeves the better to display the lovely shape of her arms. Here are Father and Mother, young, rich, and contemporary. The boy that Mother bears is bright-skinned and blond, with fierce serpent's eyes. He becomes magnificent in war and conquest, as the god directs. His sons, presented in order of their birth, personify maleness, aristocracy, kinship, inheritance: 'Son', 'Heir', 'Kinsman', 'High Kind'.

So we see the god assisting at the begetting of progressively more and more sophisticated types of humanity. It is not, however, the god who causes this progressive 'refinement', but mankind itself, through its growth in numbers and experience and the increasing fruits of its own labour. The god planned the self-continuation of man when he arranged, in the remote age of the world, for Þræll to be born—the labouring foundation of human society. Time then establishes the generations of thralls—

*Þaðan eru komnar
þræla ættir* (13)

—and at once Rígr walks again (14), stepping precisely—réttar brauter—into the next thriving scene of human progress, just when the theatre is ready for him. In the 'generation' between the Greatgrandparents and the Grandparents, a second estate of society has begun to grow up, crowned by Afi and Amma. They, and Rígr, perpetuate it—

*Þaðan eru komnar
karla ættir* (25)

—and the god treads his right path again (26). The second estate has reached its point of evolutionary change by the time Mother holds her elegant dinner party à trois (31, 32).

The third estate reaches its point of evolutionary change—I suggest—at the crossroads of choice between war and wisdom, a choice that faces Rígr Konr Ungr. Since he has overcome his war-like parent by his greater command of wisdom, I surmise that it is he who, in the lost conclusion of the poem, determines the evolutionary choice of the highest estate and guides the Danes into peace, away from their archaic, predatory life of Vikings roving the seas and rejoicing in the wounds they inflict (48). A profound cultural change indeed.

I know of no near analogue to this analysis of human progress by the poet of Rígsþula. It is woven of many thoughts: some rising in the poet's mind from contemporary historical awareness, some from age-old speculations and modes of thinking, that he had grown up with.

(i) Historical patterns

There is a certain economic realism in the poet's picture of social wealth increasing with the increase of the human population: for wealth is based on labour. The early settlers of Iceland must have been particularly aware of this. They brought many þrælar with them. If you have no oxen for your plough, you can always yoke þrælar to it; alternatively, you can make your thralls the overseers of your estates, as the wealthy Geirmundr heljar-skinndid.¹⁴

Rank follows wealth. In Anglo-Danish England in the early eleventh century laws provided that a ceorl could attain the rank of þegn if he possessed five hides of land, or a merchant if he made three profitable voyages.¹⁵ Social mobility had 'accelerated steadily' in the three disturbed centuries preceding the Norman Conquest. To the contemporary world such upward mobility might be strikingly evident, as the power of the king and the Church grew, calling for more men in the higher social grades, and individuals rose from one class to another—from Ái's to Afi's to Faðir's estate.¹⁶ Certainly the legalistic fragments attributed to Wulfstan on the thriving of thralls to thanehood and churls to earldoms seem haunted by the ideal of social advancement.¹⁷ In a more rigid society in which social mobility no longer occurred—as in England after the end of the eleventh century—it might not have occurred to any poet either to use an upward-spiralling pattern of social mobility for his fable of the origins of estates (see Theme III below).

¹⁴ See Landn 43, 154.

¹⁵ See Liebermann I. 458; Stenton (a), 389.

¹⁶ See Runciman 3–30. There is, of course, at the same time, downward mobility, but this is not relevant to the poet's theme. In an equally disturbed period, Langland, as a satirist, notes the labourers who demand haute cuisine and the knights' sons who become ploughmen (Piers Plowman B vi. 309–13, C vi. 73).

(ii) Mythological patterns

One age-old speculation—a mythological concept—may have influenced the poet when he schematically linked human generations with progress. The descending scale from great-grandmother to grandmother to mother is used in the poem to represent the ages of the world, not in the familiar learned terms of the loss of a Golden Age, or the Fall of Man, but, on the contrary, in terms of man's ascending improvement. He grows better, not worse, materially and intellectually. This has, to my knowledge, its closest echo in the widespread cosmological notion that the earliest living beings in the world, the cosmic giants—such as Ymir—or the earth-born Titans—such as Cronos—or the primordial engendering water-demons—such as Tiamat—are superseded by their own descendants, who become gods. These descendants form a new 'estate', with higher powers, subtler minds, than the ancestors they outclass and kill. Such gods are Óðinn, Zeus, Marduk.¹⁸

In the human world of Rígsþula the theme of one generation outclassing another appears without antagonism: ancestry is a revered debt. There are, nevertheless, despite this great difference, certain shades of resemblance between the aged great-grandparents, as the poet portrays them, and the traditional Norse giants, that reinforce the thematic parallel. Ái and Edda belong to the most ancient age of the human world, as the giants belong to the most ancient age of the cosmos. They are the oldest ancestors of human life, as the giants are the oldest ancestors of the gods. In the stillness of their old age—litt megandi, like Askr and Embla in Völuspá 17, who also must wait for the gods to rescue them from impotence—they seem on the brink of inhabiting already—as the giants do—the chthonic realm of the dead. They sit symbolically by the hearth, the heart of the family, where, in the most archaic times of human society, they would be buried and venerated as benign spirits—lares guarding the fortunes of their descendants. The poet shows that this hearth is the focus of Præll's devoted toil (9). In this the poet is probably not being simply imaginative and inventive, but prompted by archaic social tradition associated with the oldest class, the 'old house' of the serfs (see commentary to 16/10). In Roman times also it was the slave class who played the most prominent part in the festivals honouring the lares. These were the only festivals in which the slaves independently brought offerings and feasted without the presence of their master.¹⁹ They were also in midwinter, when men would most need their fuel for their hearths.

¹⁷ See Bethurum in Wulfstan (a), 69–87 ('Wulfstan as Archbishop'). The use of the past tense in these legalistic fragments (see Liebermann 1. 456, in contrast to 1. 458, n. 32 c) is remarkable, more conditioned to homily than to law; for example: Hit was hwilum on Engla lagum . . . gif ceorl gepeah, þæt hē hæfde fullce fíf hida ágenes landes, cirican 7 kycenan, bellhús 7 burhgeat, sett 7 sundernote on cynges healle, þonne was hē þanon forð þegenríhtes weorðe ('It was once the case according to the English laws, that, if a ceorl prospered so that he had fully five hides of his own land, a church and a kitchen, a bell-house and walled entrance gate, a seat and special office in the king's hall, then he was from then on entitled to the rights of a þegn'). On the nostalgic tone of the lines, see Stenton (a), 390 n. 2. Wulfstan, Archbishop of York 1002–23, contributed to the drafting of Cnut's laws after the Danish conquest of England in 1016 (see Jost ch. 4, 'Cnut und Wulfstan', and references; see also n. 59).

¹⁸ A narrative statement of the killing of Ymir by Óðinn and his two brothers is given by Snorri (SnE 14); elsewhere we have only allusions to Ymir's corpse (see commentary to Vsp 3/2). Hesiod, Theogony 477–506, tells of the slaying of Cronos by Zeus. For Marduk's slaying of Tiamat, see Pritchard 66–7. On Óðinn's missing genealogical links with Ymir see commentary to Vsp 4/1.

Greatgrandmother has one other link with the giant world: she is fecund in old age, like in aldna in the Iron Forest, who gave birth to the numerous offspring of the cosmic wolf Fenrir (Völuspá 39). An aged mother is an unnatural thing and may well be expected to produce a monster, just as the foul witch Sycorax, who with age and envy was grown into a hoop, produced a Caliban.²⁰ Very different is the biblical lore that an aged mother may, by God's will, produce a rare and beautiful son—an Isaac, or a John the Baptist.

Præll, of course, is no monster, but he has the disfigurements endemic to old age and poverty and hard work that might make him and his unlvely children seem almost monstrous in the mocking eyes of those born later to better fortunes. Mocking names are another burden that Præll's kin shares with the giants—'Thistlebeard', 'Sootface', 'Slowcoach'—and the giantesses—'Hangjaw', 'Hairyfingers', 'Grittingteeth'.²¹

¹⁹ For the archaic connection between the hearth and the cult of the ancestors see Der kleine Pauly s.v. Lares, Compitalia, Herd; Reallexikon s.v. Herd; Bächtold-Stäubli s.v. Herd § 4; Elton, ch. 8, esp. 206–13; AR §§ 135, 256, 287; Levy 6 ('... the remarkable fact is now long established that this creation of a home [i.e. in caves, where the ashes of fires indicate the domestic hearth] was not confined to the living family or group. The ... bodies of Mousterian men ... were buried in trenches laboriously excavated in the floors of their caves, under conditions which leave no doubt that the living believed in their continued existence'). In an early Anglo-Saxon hut the skeleton of a man is buried, with knife and ivory comb, under the living-room floor (Hodgkin 1. 223–5). On the religious symbolism of fire and hearth see Dumézil (e) 27–40 (esp. 28, on the identification of Vesta with Terra, and the hearth-fire as 'la preuve, en quelque sorte, de la possession du sol'; 30, on the hearth as matrix; 36–7, on fire as an image of life renewed after death).

²⁰ Shakespeare, The Tempest 1. ii. 258 f.

²¹ Þistilbarði, Hrímnir, Ganglati; Hengikepta, Loðinfingra, Grottintanna, in Pulur (Jftrna heiti, Tröllkvenna heiti), Skjald B 1. 658–60. See also commentary to 2/10.

(iii) Patterns of class portraiture

The progress of man in Rígsþula, rising from the lowest to the middle to the loftiest estate, is lit by details that identify the change of class. Prosperity changes style with its degree. The heavy loaf that Edda baked is discarded for the fine-milled wastel bread to please the delicate digestions of Móðir's guests. The well-swathed and -pinned shoulders of Amma are succeeded by Móðir's low and snowy neckline. The babies change complexion, from swarthy, to ruddy, to white, and their new-born eyes, heavy with sleep—I would conjecture—from the ancestry of toil, in the lowest estate, are wakeful and wavering in the middle estate—like those of ordinary babies at birth—but imperiously focused in the highest. All three are sprinkled with water in an identical baptismal rite, but then wrapped in different grades of cloth, from coarse linen to silk. Daughters-in-law show a particularly interesting development with prosperity: the serf-girl is by far the freest. She makes her own sunny way on foot through the mud to Præll's home, and settles herself in the middle of his bench with the confident centrality of Rígr himself. She chooses her husband for herself—once they have talked together and told each other about themselves—and they make their bed together with decisive equality. Such liberty is not for the upper classes. An unspecified control—'they'—arranges the marriages of the brides of Karl and Jarl, and the girls are driven by wagon to their new homes to bow their heads modestly beneath the bridal veil. They have the freedoms that possessions give—Karl's betrothed comes with her keys dangling at her belt—but they do not dispose of themselves.²² As differences proliferate, the common mankind of the three classes is steadily re-expressed through the identical human situations that bind them—the houses, doors, meals, beds, babies, baptism, swaddling bands, work, marriage, and children again.

If we look at these details of class distinction, we can see that most are based on the obvious differences between the life of the rich and the life of the poor, of the courtly and the burgherly, of the slave and the free-born. From other medieval estates literature we are familiar with the dirty-skinned peasant—rusticus—with scurfy hair, pushing his plough, and the smooth-shaven clericus, aping the manners of the court; familiar also with the sharp-eyed enumeration of those details of dress that signify rank, or pretension, especially in times when certain luxuries in material or style were restricted by law to the upper classes.²³ But this form of literature, often heavily weighted with satire, is commonly confined to the contemporary 'field full of folk' of the writer's own society, and more concerned with the social degeneration that has led to it than the social progress.

²² On Christian limits on coercion see Noonan.

²³ On estates satire see the fine account of sources and secondary literature in J. Mann, esp. 295–322. On prohibited clothing see also Fónsbók 115–16, 'Um skróðklæða burð' ('On the wearing of fine clothing').

The most minute analysis of class distinctions in Europe, tirelessly accumulating details of comparative wealth, is found in early Irish laws, especially the Críth Gablach ('Law of Status', c. 700). Jean Young was the first to relate Irish laws to Rígsþula, noting 'how great a fascination the division of society into various grades exercised over the Irish mind'.²⁴ The author of the Críth Gablach, concerning himself mainly with the free laity, meticulously defines the grades of men in relation to each other, in an attempt to establish systematically the basis upon which their status—and so their legal value—rested. A man of 'sevenfold property status' would have 'seven cows with their bull, seven pigs with a domestic boar, seven sheep . . . He has a fourth share of a plough, . . . a goad, a halter, a cooking pot . . .'. The size of his house appropriate to his status may be described in precise detail: 'It is larger than seventeen feet; it is of wicker-work to the lintel. . . . Between every two beds shall be an oaken plank . . .'. Another, richer, farmer has 'a house of twenty-seven feet and an outhouse of fifteen feet, . . . a share in a mill, so that he may grind for his family and guests'. Also the food that different grades of men eat is specified: one has milk and curds only, and no butter; another has 'butter with condiments'.²⁵ In Rígsþula we can, distantly but distinctly, hear the harmonics of these systematic, theoretical, legal constructions, presenting mounting social difference within identical categories of reference. By their pragmatic richness of material the Irish status-law provisions suggest—whether intentionally or not—the vigorous possibility, or at least the vigorous dream, of social advancement.

(iv) Outmoded patterns of social theory

In the acceleration of social rank in Rígsþula there is one sign of change that some scholars would not relate to the 'progress of man' but to an archaic form of Indo-European class symbolism; namely, the changing colour of the human complexion with the social class: Præll is black

²⁴ Young 100. Young refers particularly to the laws of fosterage where the clothing colours of the different ranks of sons are elaborately itemized, and their food and their finery (Senchus Mor II. 147–51). The Críth Gablach is edited, with trans., in the Brehon Law Tracts 297–334; a later trans. is that of MacNeill, and a later edition that of Binchy. For a precisely documented and most illuminating discussion see Charles-Edwards. Vestigial itemization of property in relation to social class is found in Anglo-Saxon laws (see n. 17 above, references to Liebermann).

²⁵ In the Middle Irish text 'The Settling of the Manor of Tara', at the great feast of Diarmait son of Cerbal food of different kinds was served to different ranks: 'choice fruit and oxen and boars and flitches' to kings, ollaves, and free noble elders; 'red meat from spits of iron, and bragget and new ale' for warriors; 'heads-and-feet' to charioteers and jugglers and the common people; 'veal then and lamb and pork' for young men and maidens; see Best for full text and translation. I thank Máire Herbert for this reference. See also Reinhard ch. 5, esp. 93 n. 2.

(svartr), Karl is red (rauðr), and Jarl is a radiant blond (bleikt . . . hár, biarter vangar). Dumézil first noted the parallel between the colour hierarchy in Rígsþula and the colours that were used as symbols of the Indian caste system: white for the priestly brahmin caste, red for the warrior caste, black/blue for the cultivators of the land (a colour later given to the servile caste).²⁶ The Sanskrit term for caste, varṇa, itself signifies 'colour'. The archaic society to which this colour symbolism related was seen as static.

Clear traces of this colour-caste symbolism survive in other Indo-European sources. By the time of modern record it is found even in non-Indo-European. There is an African fabliau, told by Frobenius in his 'Black Decameron', which, in its use of the colour symbolism of status, reads like a parody of Rígsþula.²⁷ The comparison is illuminating: Simoa, trickster and sexual daredevil, needing money, stands in the market-place naked, his penis painted with three different colours, blue, red, and white. For pieces of gold, he offers to beget upon the ladies different classes of offspring: if only the blue tip is used (and the payment is small), a herdsman is begotten; if the red central section is used (for a greater fee), a village headman will result, and if the last section, white, is used, and royally paid for, the lady will be the mother of a regional overlord. The ladies are naturally anxious to pay the highest fee.

Here again we see, though in a less conventional form, the link between 'more' wealth and 'more' rank, and the mothers' husbands cuckolded in a good cause. But all the babies fathered by Simoa were no doubt expected to be more or less the same colour. In the tale of Simoa, the colour associated with the babies is only symbolic; it is not in the pigment of their skins. In Rígsþula the colour of the babies is made part of a conventional class portraiture: together with the eyes that show breeding and the fingers formed by work, coarse or fine (cf. 8, 40), we have the un-Nordic swarthinness of autochthonous populations, the rubicund strength of the ox-taming farmer, the golden hair of Viking heroes—all quite at home in the world of other medieval Norse sources.²⁸ The complexions accord, with a certain naturalism, with the kind of life each class leads, the food it eats, the ancestry it inherits—with the mud and the pigswill and the sunburnt labour (cf. 10, 12), or with the clean leisure of swimming and chess (cf. 42). By the progress of man, and the refinement of human conditions that it brings, the dark will grow light. So the poem implies.

²⁶ See Dumézil (f) 7 f. In many texts that Dumézil cites in his numerous articles on colour-class symbolism the situation is never as simple as in the single poem Rígsþula, since his texts reflect centuries of changing conditions (e.g. the development of a fourth class). Traces of the 'ancien système' of three colours and three classes in Indian tradition, he notes (n. 1), are to be found in the rules of Vedic domestic ceremonies from the 10 c. to the 6 c. BC: in the Grihya-Sūtra of Gobhila II. 120, in Kāṇḍikā 7, on the selection of a site for the building of a house, 'the earth should be white, if he is a Brāhmaṇa, red if he is a Kshatriya [warrior], black if he is a Vaiśya [tiller of the soil]'. The same prescriptions are found in the Khādīra-Grihya-Sūtra, II. 428. Dumézil can hardly be right ((f) 3) when he considers Præll and his descendants as heterogeneous to the classes above him. The poet shows that Præll is of the same genus by expressing his relationship to the other two classes in family terms: his class provides the great-grandparents of all.

²⁷ Leo Frobenius, Das schwarze Dekameron. I have only been able to obtain an English selection of this rare work, trans. P. and K. Ross. For this fabliau see p. 275, in the collection of Kabyle tales, Ainichthem. For reference to an Arabic legend of God's creation of the three races of man from white, black, and red material, see de Vries (c), 55 and n. 18.

Since the complexion colours, black, red, white, form so unforced a part of the Norse character of the poem, why should we relate them to archaic Indo-European social traditions? Might not the colour parallelism be fortuitous? For two reasons it seems to me improbable that it should be so:

1. Evidence adduced by Dumézil suggests that in Indo-European a colour symbolism of classes originally served to express a functional analogy that was believed to exist between divine and human society: each estate had a particular function in society, linked to a particular type of deity. A colour identified this bond, displayed in street hangings or garments or hair-dye. A Hittite priestess prays to the gods of a hostile city to come to the friendly sacrifices she has prepared for them, along three roads she has strewn with coloured cloth, one with white, one with red, one with blue. The three kinds of deity form the pantheon, and each kind is enticed to peace along its own ritual path of colour.²⁹

Less rare is the evidence of the symbolic colours in clothing. White, with its associations of light, of heaven, of sanctity, is used for the vestments of druids, for the official cap—albogalerus—of the flamen Dialis of Jupiter. Red, with its martial associations of blood and rage, is the colour of the short cloak—paludamentum—that Roman generals wore on the Capitol, before leaving for war.³⁰

²⁸ I offer a few examples of popular 'colour' traditions to compare with Ríg: (a) for Præll's dark complexion, see commentary to Hamð 12/3. Slaves (wēalas—also signifying the Britons) are described as 'black' (swearde), and a slave-woman (wāle) as 'dark-haired' (wonfeax) in OE Riddle 12/4, 8 (ASPR III. 186). Kormakr is despised by a servant girl for his dark complexion (Ambáttin kvað Kormák vera svartan ok ljótan, Korm 210); (b) For Karl's high colouring, compare that of Óláfr Haraldsson—rjóðr i andliti—who, like Karl, had great physical energy—íþróttamaðr mikill—and was a skilled and critical craftsman—hagr ok sjónhannarr um smíðir allar—just as Karl must have been (22/4–7); Hkr II. 4. We may note also the trusty vigour of Robert the Red, son of a Danish fisherman, in Havelok 1687, 1889; (c) For Jarl's fairness, compare that of the Jömsvingar Sveinn Búason, who refused to let any þræll hold back his long golden hair—gult sem silki—for his execution, but insisted that a hirdmaðr should do so (Jömsvinga Saga 41, ch. 37). A head of long silky fair hair was attributed to Haraldr hárfagri, founder of the Norwegian royal line, by the author of Fagrsk 58, ch. 2; and in the prophetic dream of his father, Hálfðan the Black, the longest lock of hair that grew from his head 'conquered all the rest' by its beauty and bright fairness (með ljósleik), symbolizing St Óláfr Haraldsson, holiest and most radiant of Norway's kings (Fagrsk 58, ch. 1). Though this saint had, according to Agrip 26, brown hair and a reddish beard, his predecessor St Óláfr Tryggvason had hair white in its blondness (hvítr á hárslit allan, Agrip 22).

²⁹ Dumézil (b), 54–7, and (e), 47, cites and discusses this Hittite evocatio (in French translation) from J. Friedrich 42 (a book I have not been able to see).

³⁰ See Pauly–Wissowa and Der kleine Pauly s.vv. albogalerus, paludamentum. Dumézil (e), 56–7,

The symbolic colour of the human–divine class relationship is also manifested in the hair. The Germanic general Civilis, before a campaign against the Romans, let his hair grow long and dyed it red, ‘in accordance with a barbarian vow’. He cut it only after achieving the slaughter of the legions.³¹ In Rígsþula farmer Karl is red-haired. Þórr was the war-god of the Vikings who fought, settled, and farmed in Ireland and Russia: he too was red-haired—familarly called hit rauða skegg, ‘Red Beard’—and, according to Lappish record, nicknamed ‘Karl’.³² Jarl is born flaxen-haired. He is the only acknowledged son of the figure Heimdallr–Óðinn–Rígr, the only one to be given the divine name. Only he reflects the paternity of Heimdallr, hvítastr ása, ‘the whitest, most shining of the Æsir’, the most holy of gods.³³

Once human society had travelled so far historically from its divine begetting, a man might well have to use hair-dye to affirm the link with his deity. But in the ancient days of Rígr—our poet assures us—the class colour was naturally there, in the begotten body itself.

That a Norse god might ‘possess’ a specific social class of human beings is asserted with unequivocal clarity in Hárbarðsljóð 24:

emphasizes that the symbolic values attributed to these colours in this way are such as can be ‘re-invented’ everywhere at any time. How could it be otherwise? ‘Il faut bien qu’il y ait, dans tout objet ou qualité employé comme signe, de quoi justifier l’usage qui en est fait.’ Nevertheless, he assures us, the association of the three colours, white, red, blue/black, in a symbolic system, with the functional values he has defined, is extremely rare and found only in connection with the fundamentally tripartite IE societies. It is of comparative value to note that in other societies the colour-system white, red, black, can have quite different symbolic significance, not directly relating to class. In Black Africa (see Zahan 365–96) white commonly represents the otherworld of heaven, from which life comes (new-born babies are pale-skinned) and to which the dead go. It is also the king’s symbolic colour, as he is closest to heaven. Red represents (on the analogy of pottery) the ‘cooking’ period between childhood and maturity, while black represents the fullness and splendour of maturity and authority.

Dumézil cannot point to any symbolic use of blue/black clothing comparable to that of the albo-galerus and paludamentum (though the variant green, representing Venus–Flora, appears in early Roman chariot races beside the red and white of Mars and Jupiter; (c) 55). I suggest that the blue/black garments traditionally worn by a man in ancient Iceland who intended to kill an enemy may represent the symbolic colour of the Vanir, deities of the fertility of the black earth, priests of sacrifice (cf. Hrafnkels Saga 104, n. 3). The terrible Eumenides, subterranean daughters of Night, are black-clad and avenge crimes against fundamental human laws (matricide, incest) by poisoning the earth as punishment (see, inter alia, Aeschylus, The Eumenides 52, 352, 370, 780–7).

³¹ Tacitus, Historiae iv. lxi. Livy, describing the ferocity of the Gauls in war, notes their flowing and red-tinted hair (rutilatae comae, xxxviii. xvii. 3).

³² On Þórr in Ireland and Russia see AR §§ 278, 418 and references there cited. The name of the Lappish thunder-god, Horagalles, is commonly accepted as a version of Þórr karl (Olrik (a), 46–7; E. O. G. Turville-Petre 84, 98, 299 nn.; AR § 419. The convention of adding karl, ‘old fellow’, affectionately after a personal name was common; see Fritzner s.v. karl). For Þórr as ‘Red Beard’ see Óláfs Saga Tryggvasonar of Oddr Snorrason 173–4. That farmers should worship a defending warrior god, such as Þórr, is seen also in the cult of Mars pater as purifier of the earth, promoter of crops, protector of oxen (for the invocations see Cato, De Agri Cultura cxli; Dumézil (c), 28–30).

³³ See Þrym 15/2, SnE 32, commentary to Lks 20/1–8.

Óðinn á iarla,	Óðinn has the earls
þá er í valfalla,	who fall in the slaughter,
en Þórr á þræla kyn.	while Þórr has the tribe of thralls.

Óðinn, who is speaking, mockingly degrades Þórr from his karla kyn, using the alliterative opportunity to give him the lowest class of all (though he knowingly greets him at the outset of the poem as karl karla, Hárbarðsljóð 2/1). I have not succeeded in finding elsewhere in Dumézil’s documentation a text that states so clearly the connection between a deity and a human class. The sophisticated use of the colour-class symbolism in Rígsþula suggests that the underlying themes were domestically familiar from olden times in Norse society, and had frequently been drawn upon as a source of wit.

2. A second reason for supposing that the Indo-European colour-class symbolism lies behind that in Rígsþula, is that the colour schema—black, red, white—applied to the babies’ complexions must be the primary structure on which the remainder of the tripartite descriptive schema is based. No other descriptive motif involved exists in Norse sources in tripartite form. The other motifs have had to be developed by the Norse poet(s) in tripartite form in order to substantiate the class complexions of Þræll, Karl, and Jarl. For example, the babies have distinctive eyes, but in Norse tradition the only positive description of eyes in relation to social rank is found in the legendary aristocratic clans of Viking heroes.³⁴ Helgi the Volsung is betrayed by his eyes, when he tries to disguise himself as a farmer’s bondmaid—

Hvöss ero augo	‘Piercing are the eyes
í Hagals þýio—	of Hagall’s bondmaid—
era þat karls ætt,	that is no commoner’s kin
er á kvernom stendr . . .’	who stands at the quern . . .’

(Helgakviða Hundingsbana II 2)

The farmer explains that ‘she’ is a captive Viking princess. So, in Rígsþula, a positive description of the eyes of the two lower classes has to be invented to supplement the bare negative comparisons which are all that tradition affords. The structural priority of the tripartite colour-class symbolism in the composition of the poem suggests that it is a concept that pre-existed the composition of the poem, and—since we have Indo-European analogues—was not purely the product of Norse poetic invention.

At the same time, we may note as a sign of modernity in Rígsþula that the association of one kind of deity with one human class, and another with another, is already becoming otiose in the poem, although it is present.

³⁴ See Kroesen; commentary to 35/8.

Karl is red-headed, yet there is no role for Þórr in the poem. That warrior role has been invaded by Óðinn and his earls (and Óðinn has no colour associations in Norse). By contrast, the royal-divine blondness of Rígr Jarl correctly reflects the ancient colour symbolism of his function, which is itself integral to the poem.

Pursuit of analogues for Theme I suggests that three models may here have contributed to the structure of the poem: (a) the cosmological concept of primordial giants as the ancestors of the gods; (b) the legal—and, no doubt, popularly widespread—evaluation of social status in comparative terms of property; (c) a historical situation of upward social mobility in the poet's own society. The poet's dynamic concept of one class growing out of another—just as, he implies, one generation of a family grows out of another—breaks away completely from any earlier hieratic tradition the Norsemen may have known of a human society ab origine tripartite in its class structure, corresponding to the tripartite society of its gods. Observation appears to have made any such notion old-fashioned.

Theme II: The peripatetic guest and partner of wives: king and god

Rígsþula is built upon two figures, the ladder and the circle. Man moves up and—though not in this poem—down on the ladder. God circles around. Theme II is the circle.

The relevance of an early medieval Latin text to the composition of Rígsþula was noted by Nora Chadwick in 1955.³⁵ As far as I know, it has not been greatly discussed since then. It is an interpolation, hardly later than the ninth century, and possibly much earlier, by an Irish writer, in the text of Solinus, supplementing the brief description of the many islands round Britain. If you sail for two days from Scotland north towards Thyle, you come upon the Hebrides: 'five islands all told, whose inhabitants know no crops, but live on fish and milk. There is one king over all the islands, for, though they are numerous, all are separated only by narrow straits. The king has nothing of his own, but rather all the possessions of all his subjects. He is constrained to conformity by definite laws, and, lest avarice turn him from the right course, he learns justice by poverty, as one who has no private property, but is maintained at public cost. No woman is given him as his own, but, with continual change, he takes on loan whatever woman he is stirred by. Therefore he is not allowed to pray or hope for children.'

³⁵ Chadwick 56–115, esp. 58, 108 ff. See Solinus 234–5: Ebudes insulae quinque numero, quarum incolae nesciunt fruges, piscibus tantum et lacte vivunt. rex unus est universis, nam quotquot sunt, omnes angusta interluvie dividuntur. rex nihil suum habet, omnia universorum. ad aequitatem certis legibus stringitur ac ne avaritia devertat a vero, discit paupertate iustitiam, utpote cui nihil sit rei familiaris, verum alitur e publico. nulla illi femina datur propria, sed per vicissitudines, in quamcunque commotus sit, usurariam sumit. unde ei nec votum nec spes conceditur liberorum.* (* for the translation of aequitatem some prefer 'justice'.) On the 'Irish interpolator of Solinus' see Mommsen in Solinus lxxv for suggested dating. On Solinus (c. AD 250) see Der kleine Pauly s.v.: 'Tadelte man frühe S. wegen der schweren Fehler u. Verfälschungen des Plin., so treten heute die oft erstaunlichen Zusätze des S. zu Plin. hervor. . . z. T. kommen sie aus unbekannter Quelle.' This would seem to be valid also for the interpolations Solinus's own text invited.

The Hebridean king must have travelled as a guest among the islands, distributing the burden of his upkeep among different homes, being expected to sleep—if he wished—with the wives or other womenfolk of his various hosts. Like the kings of Norway when they travelled in their realm, he would, no doubt, sleep with women of different classes, bond and free.³⁶

This archaic royal behaviour in the Hebrides bears certain resemblances to that of Rígr in Rígsþula: the travelling from host to host without possessions on the journey; the ready entrée and hospitality in homes of different rank; the right to use the marital bed of others; the absorption of any offspring into the family of the host. Even the repetitive formality of Rígr's progress, and the straight correctness of his paths—réttar brauter—suggest a certain kinship with the legal constraints upon the king.

The explanation that springs to mind, to account for these similarities, is that the Hebridean king lives a ritual life as a surrogate god, binding his people together by his visitations and ensuring the continuance of their offspring, upon which their prosperity—their future—depends. Rígr's visiting of human homes represents a version of the desired pattern of divine behaviour which the royal Hebridean ritual life—tightly bound by law—was designed to copy.

There are other versions of this divine travelling. Three Germanic deities and an early Irish saint are characteristically associated with the peripatetic visitation of human society. Nerthus, Freyr, and St Brigida go by wagon. Óðinn goes on foot. Once a year, when the growth of the earth is beginning, the goddess Nerthus—id est Terra mater, Tacitus tells us³⁷—is ³⁶ See Roger of Howden III. 272: '... it is the custom of the kingdom of Norway down to the present day that everyone who is recognized to be the son of any King of Norway, even though he be a bastard and born of a serving wench, can claim for himself as great a right to the kingdom of Norway as the son of a wedded King and one born of a free woman' (I cite the translation of Gathorne-Hardy). Roger was contemporary with Sverrir († 1202); his Chronicle ends in 1201.

³⁷ Tacitus, Germ xl. The interjection, id est Terra Mater, may stem from Tacitus himself, rather than from his informant. Picard, 174–5, notes that Tacitus may have been influenced in his portrayal of the Nerthus cult by the popularity in his day of the Phrygian cult of the Magna Mater, sponsored in Rome by the Quindecimviri, of whose priestly college Tacitus was a member. In the ceremony of the lavatio, on 27 March, the symbol of the goddess was drawn in a wagon by heifers to be bathed in a small tributary of the Tiber. Nerthus has close Nordic analogues—the same name as Njörðr, Freyr-like perambulations among her worshippers, nuptial bathing like Íðunn—so that it seems very unlikely that Tacitus' account of her festival on a Baltic island should be wholly based on his Roman knowledge of the Magna Mater. For the wheeling of a cult image round the inhabited countryside, to be worshipped with sacrifice, see the account of Athanaric's persecution of the Christians in Gothia, c. 370 (Sozomenus VI. 37. 13 (p. 296); trans. Hartraft II. 374. The drawn by two heifers round the countryside in her covered sacred vehiculum. She accepts lodging and entertainment—hospitium—from the rejoicing people. Freyr, for his wheeled ceremonial progress, has only the late burlesque testimony of Flateyjarbók.³⁸ Nevertheless, the traditions are valuable. In Sweden, as winter takes its course, Freyr's idol is drawn arduously by mountain paths in a snowstorm from one district to another, to perform the ceremonies of blessing the land for a good season (árbot). People rejoice to see their snow-conquering god eat and drink with them—he is impersonated by an impish Iclander 'on the run'—and they are especially pleased with the good omen for their future, that he has made his priestess pregnant. St Brigida rode, in the manner of Celtic princes, in a horse-drawn chariot round the plains of Ireland—per campum Tethbe, . . . per campum Liffi—healing, helping, and making happy; 'always moving, she dwells everywhere and nowhere' resplendent with joy: 'quotidie lætitiarum præstat mihi'. Her feast day comes when winter is ending, on February 1.³⁹

The deities who visit on wheels are of course meant to be recognized as gods and fêted. But Óðinn goes incognito, with secret purposes, stígandi, like Rígr. He is Vegtamr, viator indefessus, the god-Gestr who will step into any home: a wizard, bringing the fertility of his science—his fræði—into men's minds.⁴⁰

All these peripatetic figures in their constant rounds of visitation parallel the circling image of the sun 'travelling', bringing beneficence to men with the physical conception of fresh life. Each figure is associated with one or more of the known symbols or mythological roles of the sun—the wheel, the car, the horse, the undying flame, the single eye, the engulfment by the wolf, the sovereignty of the world, marital union with the earth—as well as the perpetual motion of travel. Like Freyr and the Hebridean rex, Rígr bears a title of overlordship over men, and it is this aspect of his solar affinity that forms the climax of the poem, the creation of the first human king.⁴¹

With the solar theme of sovereignty, another traditional theme comes passage is discussed by E. A. Thompson 31). Note also the Indiculus xxviii (c. 750), which has the chapter heading (only): de simulacro quod per campos portant.

³⁸ Flat 1. 337–9. For Freyr's power to defy snow, cf. Gísl ch. 18.

³⁹ See Acta Sanctorum February 1, 118–34. I am much indebted to the vivid introduction to the Vitæ S. Brigidae of Berschin, 230–8, and to the article by McGrath. The motif of flame and fire continually recurs in Brigida's adventures, and she hangs her washing on a sunbeam. She even becomes one-eyed, like Óðinn, after praying to be disfigured, to avoid the imposition of a bridegroom (her eye is restored when she takes the veil).

⁴⁰ See UD (i), 663–4; Vsp Introd 11 on stanza 27.

⁴¹ On Freyr's name, 'Lord', see Green 19–55. For illuminating references to Irish traditions of the sun see O'Rahilly 58–9, 286–307 ('The Traveller of the Heavens'), 520–1. The relationship between the sun and sovereignty is most explicit in Egyptian record, the sun-god Re being called the first king of Egypt: 'Kingship, in Egypt, was as old as the world. It dated from the day of creation', and the sun-god is the creator (see Frankfort (a), 16–17, 50–1). The kings addressed in historical texts are referred to as gods (see Pritchard 229b, 234b, 235a, 260a).

into play that is relevant to Rígsþula. If the sovereign sun weds the earth, then all that grows from her—including man—is of the sun's begetting.⁴² To secure the perpetuation of this primordial begetting, the sun, the procreator, must continually be reintroduced in the world of time: as it is for the earth in summer, so for man and wife in the bed. The poet of Rígsþula clearly underlines this fact in his refrain stanzas. The keyword of time and progress in the poem, meirr, is linked obtrusively with a second keyword, miðr—'in the middle of the road . . . of the benches . . . of the dishes . . . of the bed' (3, 4, 5, 6, etc.). The crescendo of centrality leads to the centre of the bed, to the intervention of the god himself in human procreation. 'Man and the sun generate man'⁴³ within the home.

Divine intervention in the marriage bed is most clearly re-enacted in an Indian wedding ritual, when, for the first three nights after the wedding, a staff of wood, anointed and beribboned, is placed between the married couple. It represents the Gandharva—'the divine and solar Eros'⁴⁴—and is made from sappy wood from fig or other fruitful trees among which the Gandharva spirits live. The Gandharva serves the married couple, for Buddhist texts say that it is by the coming together of three things that pregnancy occurs: the father, the mother, and the Gandharva, 'who stands ready'. Like Rígr-Óðinn, the Gandharva plays the role of Priði, 'Third One', in the marital trio.⁴⁵ Like Rígr-Heimdallr, the Gandharva is embodied in the wood of a tree. By placing himself in the marital bed of every human class, Rígr becomes 'related by marriage to each and every home' (Hyndluljóð 43). When Loki derides Frigg (Lokasenna 26) for putting her arms round two husbands, I suggest that he is alluding to her ritual situation as wife-and-mother goddess, who must embrace both the 'Desire'

⁴² For a finely documented demonstration of this theme see Coomaraswamy (a), 46–7, 50 n. 13.

⁴³ Coomaraswamy (a), 50 n. 13, cites this sentence from Aristotle, The Physics II. 2. The sentence stands out stylistically from its context (ἀνθρώπος γὰρ ἀνθρώπων γεννᾷ καὶ ἥλιος), and the editors suppose a hiatus following it in the text. But Aristotle was perhaps citing a popular saying (cf. Hamlet II. ii: 'Let her not walk i'th' sun' lest she conceive)?

⁴⁴ Coomaraswamy (a), 50 n. 13. On the Gandharva in the marital context, see Oldenberg 92 n. 1, 248–9. On the three nights of marital chastity ('Tobiasnächte') see AR § 140 and references in n. 2 (i.187). Meissner (c), 126, notes the modest reserve and 'fairy-tale-like' avoidance of explicit statement in the phrasing of the god's conduct in the bed (5, etc.). The poet knows that he is representing a religious 'mystery', but at the same time is enjoying the humour of the contrast between the mystery and the solidity of the setting.

⁴⁵ The aptness of the Óðinn-name Priði in the earth kenning biðkván Priðja, 'waiting wife of Priði', Hák 6/4, is pointed out by Davidson 500–1. It is interesting to note a certain ambivalence in the husband's attitude to the Gandharva in Indian tradition: he is glad to see him gone after three nights. In a wedding prayer (cited by Oldenberg) he begs him to seek another lady: 'Move away from here—we give you our devotion—but let the wife unite with her husband'. In an old Swedish wedding custom the ambivalence expresses itself as a tug-of-war: a freshly uprooted tree was brought to the house of the wedding; the married folk pulled to bring it in, the unmarried pulled to keep it out (Hammarstedt 490–1). I would suggest that the sword that is placed in legend and romance between two lovers is the secular descendant of the tree-god in the bed.

of her human husband, Vili, and the sacred presence of the 'Hallowed One', Vei. This ritual situation is evidently an archaic one in Norse.

The custom of offering an honoured guest the host's wife to sleep with has been widespread, but, except in Rígsþula and Lokasenna 26, I have not found instances where the host remains in the bed as well. This alone would seem to point to the symbolic nature of Priði's presence.

Before Rígr comes to the three couples, they have no children.⁴⁶ His ráð brings them children, opens the doors of conception for them. Behind the poet's invention here, there would seem to be the analogue of a very ancient social tradition, that of the droit de seigneur, by which the superior man, the king, the surrogate god, took on himself the task of opening the doors of conception, destroying the menace of virginity.⁴⁷ So Gilgamesh demanded to be first with every bride: 'the king to be first and the husband to follow, for that was ordained by the gods from his birth, from the time the umbilical cord was cut'.⁴⁸ And Conchobar, High King of Ulster, slept with every nubile girl in his realm, before her marriage.⁴⁹

Gilgamesh was resented for his seigneurial tyranny. For Rígr, by contrast, all the human homes stand open when he comes—hurð var á gætti, . . . hurð var á skíði, . . . var hurð hnigin. Had the doors been shut, he would not have entered, because he was not wanted. The goddess Syn, 'Refusal', would have kept him out: hon gætir dura í hollinni ok lýkr fyrir þeim, er eigi skulu inn ganga, 'she guards the door of the hall and shuts it against those who are not to enter'.⁵⁰ A woman could shut the door against the spirit of conception. If she wanted no more children, she should shut the door of her house with the feet of her new-born child⁵¹—otherwise the spirit might come walking through again—like Rígr—from outside. But in Rígsþula the god's visits are as welcome to the people as those of Nerthus and Freyr, and his terrestrial journey, like theirs, begins as winter ends, grænar brauter, 'on green ways' (1/2).

⁴⁶ Their generational names relate to the world's ages: Edda is not 'literally' mother of Amma, only symbolically so.

⁴⁷ This theme is most clearly seen in Norse in the deflowering of Brynhildr by Sigurðr on behalf of Gunnarr, as told in Piðrek II. 308–10, ch. 228–9.

⁴⁸ Gilgamesh, trans. Sandars, 66.

⁴⁹ See Thurneysen (a), 525. As a sign of reverence the men of Ulster gave their wives to Conchobar, when he stayed the night with them. I am not bringing into the discussion, as it is not in the direct line of argument, the frequent theme in Irish legend of the begetting of heroes by gods upon the wives of kings or noblemen, and the common Celtic situation of the 'boy without a father'. Richly documented discussion is given by Chadwick.

⁵⁰ SnE 39. The sexual symbolism of doors and locks is widely found (cf. Song of Solomon 5: 2–6; Gottfried von Strassburg, Tristan 17001–5: 'wan swer zer Minnen tür in gât, / den man von innen niht in lât, / daz enist der minnen niht gezalt, / wan daz ist valsche oder gewalt. / Durch daz ist dâ der Minnen tor . . .') ('when anyone enters at Love's door who has not been admitted from within, it cannot be accounted Love, since it is either Deceit or Force. Love's gate is there to prevent it . . .', trans. Hatto, 265).

⁵¹ Bächtold-Stäubli s.v. Tür col. 1198.

Pursuit of the analogues of Theme II uncovers no Christian source material, but very many pre-Christian religious concepts and superstitions, which survive often as folklore, late into the Christian period. In Rígsþula they do not seem to be charged with any Christian religious significance.

Theme III: The three estates: their origins and their king

According to Vafþrúðnismál 33, the first progeny in the world sprang from the body of the cosmic giant: a girl and boy—mey ok móg saman—from his armpit, and a monstrous son, with six heads, begotten by his feet. In Indian myth a cosmic body, Puruṣa—a colossal personification of man—was cut up in sacrifice by the gods, and his different parts were made into the different estates of men—the feet, here too, giving birth to the least lovely progeny.⁵²

When they divided the Puruṣa, into how many parts did they arrange him? What was his mouth? What his two arms? What are his thighs and feet called?

The brahmin was his mouth, his two arms were made the rajan (warrior), his two thighs the vaiśya (trader and agriculturalist), from his feet the śūdra (servile class) was born.

To account for slavery in human society, the Bible offers a more mundane and moral tale. According to Genesis 9: 19–27 the entire earth was populated after the Flood by the three sons of Noah; but one, Ham, had been punished by his father for witnessing and disclosing his father's drunken nakedness. Noah cursed the son of Ham to be the lowest of slaves—servus servorum—to Ham's more honourable brothers. This awkward text was interpreted in Christian tradition (no doubt quite in keeping with the intention of the original) to mean that slaves were a class condemned from the beginning by a sin—presumably a taboo-breaking—on the part of their first ancestor.

An Anglo-Saxon text (c. 1050) is one of the earliest records that assign specific classes, not only to Ham, but also to the other sons of Noah: to Ham the servile (wælic), to Japhet the free commoner (cýrlisc), to Shem the noble (gesýðcund).⁵³

Rígsþula does not share this biblical theory of serf origins. The poet does not present slavery as a curse, or as a command of God,⁵⁴ but as the natural first condition of human life on earth: 'When Adam delved and Eve span, ⁵² A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy 19.

⁵³ For text, translation, bibliographical reference, see Hill 82–3. On the term wælic, 'servile', see Rig Introd n. 28.

⁵⁴ As Fuchs, with noble feeling, misunderstands the poem (150–1): 'Die Leibeigenschaft als ein Gebot Gottes hinzustellen, die Ketten der Sklaverei ewig und unzerreissbar zu machen, das ist der wahre Sinn dieses finsternen und grausamen Gedichtes'.

who was then the gentleman?' The poet avoids any concern with the subjection of one class to another. No dependence is mentioned, no envy, no complaint, no awareness of any way of life but their own. All three classes are happy—even the thralls—once they have their children and their homes:

Börn ólu þau, biuggu ok unðu. *Children they bred,
had a home and were happy.*

(12, 24; cf. 41)

With excellent surgery the poet has cut away all that does not contribute to his theme of the moment, all that distracts from the god-driven surge of growing, self-contented humanity, digging itself into the world, energetically preparing the ladder for the god's next step. We can see from his many ironies that the poet is well aware of what he has left out.

As other scholars have pointed out, the three estates in Rígsþula correspond in general with the earliest continental Germanic laws: the non-free (litus, servus), the free commoner (liberus, ingenuus), the noble (nobilis, optimas).⁵⁵ Anglo-Saxon laws use the vernacular terms þēow and ceorl for the two lower orders, and for the nobles, gesīð, þegn ('king's companion', 'minister'), or, in Kentish laws only, eorl (according to Stenton, 'a primitive conception of nobility' which 'had left little impression on the social order of the other English kingdoms'). Nevertheless, the comprehensive phrase ge ceorl ge eorl, i.e. free men of low rank and high, occurs in Anglo-Saxon laws other than Kentish, showing that a popular class distinction of 'churl' and 'earl' continued in common currency.⁵⁶ The Old Norwegian laws, much later recorded than the Anglo-Saxon, use the terms þræll and jarl to denote social rating, but not karl (for whom bóndi, 'farmer-householder', is commonly used). However, just as eorl survives as a class term in ge ceorl ge eorl, so karl survives as a class term in the phrase karl ok konungr, i.e. all free men, however high-ranking.⁵⁷ The class names in Rígsþula accord with old-rooted and popular customs of speech.

Early Germanic laws often include clerics in the provisions that cover the three secular estates, but with the increasing magnitude of the Church, the Germanic social triad is transformed to make churchmen the highest ⁵⁵ There is of course occasional variety in the terms used: the 6 c. Pactus Legis Salicae has grafio and comes for the noble order (MGH. LNG. iv. i) and the Lex Burgundionum offers several variants for the different estates: optimates / maiores personae / potentes / proceres, and viliior / humilior / mediocris persona, as well as the equation, for the purpose of fines, of servus vel originarius vel colonus (MGH. LNG. ii. ii). Somewhat later laws introduce the homo ecclesiasticus, e.g. the Lex Ribuariorum (MGH. LNG. iii. ii). On Gmc origins of the estates in Ríg see esp. Fuchs 145–6; Meissner (c), 115.

⁵⁶ For the legal texts see Liebermann (Kentish Laws i. 3–14, commentary iii. 1–30); also Stenton (b), 304.

⁵⁷ See NGL v s.vv. bóndi, jarl, karl, konungr.

estate: first, the churchmen who pray, then the warriors who fight, then the toilers who maintain the economy—oratores, bellatores, laboratores. In King Alfred's words, gebedmen, fyrðmen, weorcmen.⁵⁸ These three orders Wulfstan conceives as the three pillars of the community on which the king's throne rests.⁵⁹ This image of Christian society exists in theory long before the old secular three-class system is outworn in practice—'l'idéologie . . . ne prend pas son départ dans l'observation sociale'.⁶⁰

The records of the early Germanic legal systems indicate always the presence of a king above the three social classes, but with the reformed concept of Christian class structure, the Church brought sovereignty more insistently before men's eyes, in the symbolic image of the young, wise king, throned at the threshold of the worlds of God and man, 'reflecting towards earth what he receives from the World Beyond'. So one scholar has interpreted the presentation of the king in a poem composed by a contemporary of Wulfstan's, Adalbéron, Bishop of Laon: the Carmen ad Robertum regem.⁶¹ In this dialogue between King and Bishop the glorious duties of a king—from whose blood all nobility takes its flow

Stemmata nobilium descendunt sanguine regum (v. 22)

—are set against a backcloth of the three classes. First there is Ecclesia, the regnum caelorum to which the king himself must bow; then the bellatores, protectors of the churches, guarding the people as themselves, and finally, the wretched servi, of whom Adalbéron writes most piteously, but admits that no free man can live without them—

Nam ualet ingenuus sine seruis uiuere nullus (v. 290).

Parallels between the Carmen and Rígsþula have been discovered,⁶² notably in the emphasis in both on the bond of blood between the noble estate and kingship. The question has even been asked whether Adalbéron, who was a friend of the Norman chronicler Dudo of Saint-Quentin, could have become acquainted, through him, with Scandinavian conceptions of ⁵⁸ King Alfred's OE version of Boethius, 40: the three estates are the king's 'tools' without which he cannot show his skill and power (it is the King's own addition to the text of Boethius). For further insight into Alfred's concern with kingship and society, see Nelson 239–42.

⁵⁹ Ælc riht cynestol stent on þrym stapelum, þe fullice ariht stent: an is oratores, and oðer is laboratores, and þrydde is bellatores. . . and awācige heora ænig, sōna se stōl scylfð, 'Every true kingdom, that stands wholly upright, stands on three columns . . . should any one of those weaken, at once the throne totters' (Wulfstan (b), no. 50, 267; for brief comment on this homily see Bethurum in Wulfstan (a), 39–40 and her references; also Ælfric, Lives of Saints no. 25 lines 812–32; Carozzi cxix–cxxvi; also Oexle, whose book was in press before he read Carozzi, and Duby, for many fresh insights).

⁶⁰ Carozzi cxvii.

⁶¹ Carozzi cxxxvi. The king addressed is Robert II of France (†1031), son of Hugh Capet.

⁶² Carozzi cxxxiv f.: 'Ce qui nous interesse dans ce mythe [i.e. Rígsþula] . . . c'est surtout le fait que la royauté soit présentée comme issue du groupe des nobles. Adalbéron affirme . . . plusieurs fois, cette étroite solidarité de race' (Rex speaks of regimen noster 'our (noble) order' v. 416).

kingship.⁶³ In this wide and nebulous area of enquiry too much generality is involved, too little evidence that is specific and unique, for such suspicions ever to reach confirmation or disproof. Yet it is clearly a moment of time when new and old thoughts of kingship are echoing each other.

The relationship of kingship and nobility is neatly solved in Rígsþula. Konr Ungr is son of Jarl. Was this class relationship historically so simple? In Scandinavian runic writing before the ninth century no form of konungr is found—the first instance being in the Rök Stone inscription⁶⁴—but there are five instances, in inscriptions dating from the fifth to the seventh century, of a word that may be, or be related to, an early form of jarl: erilar.⁶⁵ In each instance a personal name stands in apposition to erilar, as with a title or office; he is also the writer of the runes.⁶⁶ In Norway the jarlar of Hlaðir rivalled in power the line of kings established by Haraldr hárfagri, but even when Hákon Hlaðajarl became effectively Norway's king—

Hvar viti þú und einum	Where else might men know
jarðbyggvi svá liggja	of a land of sixteen jarls
(þat skyli herr of hugsa)	lying so under one earth-dweller?
hjarl sextian jarla?	The warrior host should think on that!

—after the Eiríkssons and the Danes had been defeated, he never changed his title of jarl. Hákon's poet Einarr expresses the Jarl's power in terms of a super-jarldom and is meticulously careful to reserve the term konungr for Hákon's opponents. Hákon is ragna konr, 'noble scion of gods', but not konungr.⁶⁷

A legendary reason for the conservatism of jarlar is given in Agrip

⁶³ Carozzi cxxxiv. Carozzi suggests that Adalbéron was attempting to bring together, 'dans un ensemble harmonieux, une pensée mythique traditionnelle et une théologie sacerdotale chrétienne. . . . Aucun des deux ne représente une vision rationnelle du monde. Tous les deux reposent sur des fondements logiques que nous ne comprenons plus' (namely, the concept of the king as the point of intersection between the divine and human worlds).

⁶⁴ See Jansson 31–7. Twice heroic bands of 'twenty kings' are mentioned on the Rök Stone, which suggests a legendary Viking context of exaggerated formaldarsaga dimensions. Though I have not yet found twenty kings specified in any text, seven are named in HH II, and more implied—Kómo þar margir konungar (prose after 18); Saxo v. vii. 4 reports six kings, each with a fleet of five thousand ships, as allies of the Huns against the Goths; three kings come to beg Guðrún to discard her sorrow, Guð II 24; cf. also Sigsk 35: þrír á hestom, / þjóðkonungar. Konungr is clearly the proudest of honorific terms in heroic tradition.

⁶⁵ Two Swedish inscriptions (Järsberg, Lindholm) and one Danish (Kragehul) have the form erilar, two Norwegian (By, Veblungsnæs) have the form erilar. Both forms show contamination (see Jóhannesson (a) § 23 n. 4). On the relationship of these forms with jarl and, possibly, with the Eruli, see de Vries (e), 461–9, where he sets out well the evidence requiring interpretation. He notes the formal parallel of the -l- suffix in jarl and karl, which may indicate a very old relationship between the terms.

⁶⁶ See Page (c), 29.

⁶⁷ Einarr Helgason skálaglamm, Vell 37 (ragna konr 32). Trans. after Davidson.

(c. 1190; the Norwegian author says that the story 'may be heard' in Eyvindr's Háleygjatal, c. 980).⁶⁸ Hersir, king of Naumudalr, wished to kill himself after his wife's death, if ever any king had done so before. No precedent for a king could be found, only for a jarl. Hersir then went to a grave-mound—by ancient custom the king's seat—and rolled himself down it, declaring that he had 'rolled himself out of the name of king'; then he hanged himself in the name of jarl. None of his descendants (who included the Hlaðajarlar) would, after that, take the name of king.

That one of Óðinn's iarla kyn (cf. Hárbarðsljóð 24) should follow the self-sacrificial precedent of the god (cf. Hávamál 138) and hang himself, seems a fitting suicide. Were the jarlar particular associates of Óðinn in that they were, like him, rune-masters—as the extant runic inscriptions suggest? Runes were the first lesson that Rígr–Óðinn taught to Jarl (37). In what may be one of the oldest fictional sources relating to jarlar, the prose narrative setting of the verses of Helgakviða Hjörvarðssonar, the Jarl Fránmarr, high officer and adviser of the king, shape-changes into a large eagle and guards the king's daughter by his magic—með fiqlkyngi. Shape-changing and wizardry—as well as the Jarl's inimical advice to refuse the princess to Hjörvarðr and so provoke war—have clear Odinic affinities.

These small straws of evidence may indeed support Ström's suggestion that the title of jarl was anciently associated with a chieftaincy 'in which magical-religious elements were involved as well as political'.⁶⁹ Certainly the Hlaðajarlar strongly opposed conversion, and Jarl Hákon's fame was based on his restoration of heathenism. On this he himself based his right to the sovereignty of Norway.

Pursuit of analogues for Theme III shows the continuance of certain early Germanic and Norse traditions, namely: (a) the three secular estates, unfree, free, and noble; (b) the taking of kings from the noble estate (cf. Germ vii: Reges ex nobilitate . . . sumunt); (c) the Odinic associations of the title jarl; (d) the lower rank of jarl to that of konungr in legend and in history. By influence or imitation of ancient Irish political tradition the noble estate is given the title Rígr to indicate its chieftaincy (see commentary to 39/2).

The poet has not been influenced by the Christian-biblical theory of class origins. Only in the structuring of the poem, in the development of Rígr Konungr out of Rígr Iarl, in the supplanting of the Viking ideal by the peaceful ideal of rulership (I would conjecture), can we identify traces of the poet's interest in the Christian ideal of the king as defender of the lives and souls of his people. The poet employs heathen terms of runic magic and gnomonic counsel to convey the gentler ethos of Konr Ungr (44), perhaps in order to emphasize that peaceful kingship was also a deep-rooted heathen ideal. While we cannot use these heathen terms as Christian evidence, we may well suspect that they cover Christian implications—especially the unparalleled terms ævinrúnar and aldrúnar, 'runes of eternity' and 'runes of life'.

⁶⁸ Agrip 18, ch. 15. The legend is told after the chronicle of Jarl Hákon's reign. Snorri tells a variant tale of a king of Naumudalr who rolls down similarly into jarl's estate, in order to offer his vassalship to King Haraldr hárfagri. Snorri's version of the theme is clearly secondary (Hkr I. 99–100). Compare the variation in Flat I. 294, where Erlingr Skjálgsson declines to be made jarl by Óláfr Tryggvason because his kinsmen have always been hersir and he does not wish to bear a higher name than theirs: behaviour fabricated for Erlingr, no doubt, on the model of that of the Hlaðajarlar.

⁶⁹ Ström (b), 442; further documented in Ström (c), esp. 72–9; cf. also de Vries (e), 465.

Etymologically, jarl appears to be an older formation than konungr, based on a root no longer meaningful in the language,⁷⁰ while konungr has etymological links with current terms for 'kin', 'race'. Some scholars are therefore inclined to regard the title konungr as an importation to Norse lands from southern Germanic kingdoms, a comparatively late imposition over the estate of jarl, dating from the Viking Age.⁷¹ Yet the title konungr is linked with Norse heathen traditions hardly less ancient in their nature than those linked with jarl: by legend, the king's seat was on the grave-mound of his royal ancestors, where their spirits would bring him guidance and luck—konungsgæfa. If the jarl's chieftaincy was linked with his command of Odinic mysteries, the konungr's was linked with the mystique of blood—and birth-ties that gave him innate right to sovereignty. These heathen traditions of blood- and birth-ties as a basis of kingship gained approval in the Christian world,⁷² while any jarl's confidence in his occult powers placed him in the devil's camp. Rígsþula shows the archaic Jarl being overtaken by the modern Konungr, as, historically, with the ⁷⁰ Cf. de Vries (c), 467.

⁷¹ The fact that Gothic does not have a form of konungr (though it has kuni, 'race', and other related words) has sometimes influenced this view (see de Vries (g) for a rich collection of relevant material). In several Danish districts there were kings c. 500, and a central kingship after 800 (according to KLNM s.v. Konge col. 4). Perhaps the most striking evidence for old-established kingship in Scandinavia is Procopius' account (vi. xiv. 42, xv. 27–36) of the Eruli, who having killed their king (ῥήγας: Procopius uses here what seems to be a nonce word in Greek), sent envoys back to their Scandinavian homeland, from their settlement on the Danube, to obtain a new king of the royal blood. Though the Eruli had been driven from Scandinavia by the Danes in the third century, one group of Eruli, with a royal family, returned to 'Thyle' after a defeat in 512. It was to this group that the regicides sent for a new king some years later. The royal return to the ancient homeland after so many years may suggest a very ancient link between king and territory (cf. Der kleine Pauly s.v. Heruli).

⁷² As Nelson, 235, notes, in elective kingship the rivalries of the many good candidates could lead to mutual ruin: 'Hence a heavy reinvestment by churchmen in the rights of heirship and blood when royal authority seemed to offer the only defence against the privatisation of ecclesiastical resources'. King, 151, also points out that 'barbarian kings ... [were] the readier to lead their peoples to Christianity precisely because its teaching on government accorded so satisfyingly with their own monarchical yearnings'. On the handing down of konungsgæfa see commentary to 37/5; also AR § 246 and references on the relationship between royal grave sites and the political organization of districts.

encroaching of Christendom, was the case. The poet, however, is primarily representing an Urzeit, not a historical situation. Konr Ungr does not depose his father Jarl; he only demonstrates his superior runic scholarship and moves away to gain Jörð, 'Earth', by peaceful marriage (I have conjectured), not, like Jarl, by Odinic war (38). At the same time, though his fable of estates and kingship may have ended with a myth, the poet evidently intended it to have contemporary, historical echoes. Why else would he bring in the Danes?

Rígsþula has been called a 'learned' work by some of the greatest Norse scholars. Meissner—as so often—has the sharpest analysis: 'The content of Rígsþula is not a myth, but rather a learned fiction made with the help of mythological material'.⁷³ It is a learned creation in two respects, I suggest: (a) it is rooted in immense heathen 'erudition', in the long inheritance of Norse and Celtic oral traditions of kingship and divinity and society, and (b) it was—in the last days before the deluge of literacy—delicately shaped to reflect, wittily, but not ignobly, certain Christian learned doctrines—most flourishing in the tenth and eleventh centuries—of the double nature of the king, royal by birth, divine by grace—by the gift and acknowledgment of God himself: Rígr Konr Ungr.⁷⁴ In heathen Odinic tradition a descendant of Óðinn—Sigurðr the dragon-slayer—was given the secrets of the god's divine runic magic that would help not only himself in need, but enable him to help other men—as if he had been designated by the god to guide them in life, like a king (see Sigrdrífumál). But that ending to Sigurðr's story—if it ever existed—is lost. Konr Ungr completes it for him, under Christian stimulus.

All the themes that moved kaleidoscopically in the minds of the poets who contributed to the formation of Rígsþula are skilfully shaken into a final simple pattern of sacral kingship, but of a sacral kingship presented with such humanity and lack of pretension that it seems like the ideal of a people who seek for a ruler rather than—as it more commonly does—like the assertion of a religious right by the rulers themselves.

⁷³ Meissner (c), 115: 'Die Rígsþula enthält keinen mythus, sondern eine gelehrte erfindung mit hilfe mythologischer mittel.'

⁷⁴ See Kantorowicz and the study of Williams (esp. Part IV, 'Regnum and Sacerdotium') that he cites as his main authority on the 'Norman Anonymous' (whose tractates, for me, throw some light on Ríg). Both Williams and Kantorowicz emphasize that the tractates do not represent 'ideas valid in [the author's] time'. Rather, 'the pattern of Christ-centred kingship for which he fought belonged to the past. He is the champion of ideals of the Ottonian and early Salian period as well as of Anglo-Saxon England, and in his tractates he actually sums up the political ideas of the tenth and eleventh centuries. But like every bard who glorifies a bygone age, he overlabours and overstresses past ideals' (Kantorowicz 60–1; cf. Williams 199–203). The tractates are a reminder that the problem of relating highly cultivated—though popular—oral poetry to the clerically learned sources that deal with the same subject is not yet solved.

E. Where and when was Rígsþula composed?

'Old and new blend in this singular poem.'⁷⁵ What is old in the poem is very old, as the analogues show. Obsolete social practices of the most archaic kind contribute to the poem's political parable. The society in which the poem originated must have had ancestral roots old enough at least to retain knowledge of such practices. Some of these practices are primarily attested in Norse traditions, some in Celtic. The use of such Norse and Celtic traditions in the poem is not by collage, but by seamless integration. This easy integration of Norse and Celtic traditions from the remote past points to the existence of an integrated Norse-Celtic community for the poem's origins, a community in which the oldest traditions of both societies had already—perhaps for several generations—made common ground both for thought and for poetry.

The Norse mythological traditions that appear in Rígsþula are more sharply in focus than the Celtic.⁷⁶ Rígr combines very precisely aspects of Heimdallr and aspects of Óðinn: the structure of the poem depends on the well-timed movement out of the traditional sphere of one deity into that of the other. The poet practises 'mythological engineering' for his own ends—a narrative advancement in the manipulation of divinities similar to that attained by Hallfreðr vandræðaskáld in his Hákonardrápa (c. 986), when he presents his patron Jarl as an Óðinn, winning by steely rape the Earth of Norway as his bride, and, after his conquests, as a Heimdallr, standing, a tree of defence for his people, with branches of budding progeny for hair. Óðinn and Heimdallr here provide a surrealist epitome of Hákon's power: they are a poetic device in the service of eulogy. The poet of Rígsþula shows the same two gods at work in the service of man—for his salvaging, if not, indeed, for his salvation. Heimdallr-Rígr rescues him at the edge of the hearth from the annihilation of sterility; Óðinn-Rígr-Konungr rescues him in his pride of strength from the annihilation of autocratic war. Had the poet not been aware of the ancient traditions of promoting, protecting, and renewing human life associated with these two heathen gods, he could not have created his poem out of them. He would not, I think, have 'believed' in the two gods, but he would have revered the aspirations they had embodied for those who once did. In other words, I suggest, he has been familiar with the most refined heathen religious concepts of the tenth century—those that had been formed in defence of the dignity of the old gods, in the face of Christian mockery and challenge.⁷⁷

⁷⁵ Meissner (c), 130 (see n. 12).

⁷⁶ This is not surprising, since the Irish were converted in the 5 c. and the Norsemen in the 10 c. In any case, the two mythologies probably differed greatly in their modes of delineating ideas even in far earlier times.

⁷⁷ See de Boor; Schier (b), 80–97; Vsp Introd iv.

The Celtic mythological traditions that appear in Rígsþula do so in the form of narrative. The god visits his people, sleeps with the married couple, ensures their fertility. The divine behaviour is timeless and repetitive and operates within a fixed society. In the Norse poem this timeless religious repetition has become a mounting spiral of secular progress, speeding on the growth of mankind to higher and higher estates. While this pattern of social advancement may owe some debt to the ancient Irish pyramidal structures of classes and kingdoms,⁷⁸ the social dynamism that inspires the Norse poem cannot have come from those ancient structures alone. Lively movements in society and politics in circles that the Norse poets knew well are more likely to have given the poem its pace and urbane wit. What evidence there is points to the Anglo-Norse circles of northern England, which—perhaps—achieved their greatest social self-confidence when a Dane was King and an Anglo-Saxon Archbishop of York compiled his laws for him: that is, in the early decades of the eleventh century.

Anglo-Saxon influence may be noted in the vocabulary of Rígsþula,⁷⁹ yet none of the fundamental themes of the poem have extant Anglo-Saxon analogues, other than—it may be—the historical situation of social mobility itself. While the thesis of the poem—the thriving progress of man—may have been perfected in the context of early eleventh century England, the material marshalled to demonstrate it is derived from much older Norse and Celtic traditions. This offers no historical problem, since Norse-Celtic communities existed in the north of England from the end of the ninth century; for some years a Norse King of Dublin was also King of York.⁸⁰ But it does offer a problem of poetic composition. How could such archaic material reappear so elegantly absorbed in an early eleventh century Rígsþula, unless that poem were a fresh version of earlier poetic formulations: old, mythico-political 'ballads' set to a new intellectual pace?

⁷⁸ See commentary to 39/2.

⁷⁹ See commentary to 16/6, 22/7, 8, 36/8, 42/3 (Aðal).

⁸⁰ Óláfr Sigtryggsson was King of Dublin 938–80 and, more precariously, of York 941–4 and 949–52. He had links with other kings: his father married a sister of Æðelstan, and his own sister married Óláfr Tryggvason, who frequently stayed with him in Dublin. He was called ri in Irish annals and given an Irish nickname that survives in Norse records: kváran (signifying a style of Celtic leather shoe, wrapped round the foot: presumably favoured by Óláfr). It is by this nickname that Óláfr kváran can be traced as the original of the hero Havelok, who, in the ME romance of that name, became King of Denmark and England, and whose disguise-name in the OF 'Breton' Lai d'Haveloc, when he was a cook's boy in England, was Cuaran (Bell 176). The fusing of legends of Óláfr kváran (who had Irish and English kingdoms) with later traditions of the uniting of England and Denmark under Knútr, provides a valuable precedent when we are considering the even more deeply concealed fusion of accumulated political themes in Ríg: a fusion that demonstrates the same alliance of Irish, Norse, and Anglo-Saxon traditions. Traditions of Aveloc Cuaran also show the involvement of Wales (Aveloc is the Welsh form of Irish Amlaibh, from an early form of ON Óláfr, Anulaibhar*): Óláfr kváran's daughter, Ragnhildr, married Cynan of Gwynedd; their son was the renowned Gruffud; Bartrum i. 41; Heyman 69–70.

In any case, the tight network of ideas behind the many scenes of the poem must have begun to be woven before the latest poet caught hold of its threads and perfected it as he wished. A poem such as Rígsþula, and its antecedents, would have been a social possession, frequently adapted and augmented to fit prevailing politics—and fashions—by the spontaneous genius of the oral poets and their critical, participating, audiences.

There are some pieces of poetic evidence that suggest that an early form of Rígsþula may have been in existence in the last decade of the tenth century. In Iceland Úlfr Uggason, in his Húsdrápa (c. 985), calls Heimdallr ráðgegninn, 'helpful, profitable, in his advice / in his marital alliances' (Húsdrápa 2/1). The context is the god's winning of the talisman of fertility out of Loki's grasp; an allusion to Heimdallr's fertile function in another myth would therefore be particularly apt in Úlfr's poem. Indeed it is only by reference to Rígsþula that ráðgegninn in Húsdrápa takes on significance. Úlfr may have known a Rígsþula in which the keyword ráð appeared in refrain, as in the extant poem: he could then be confident that his succinct allusion in ráðgegninn would be grasped.⁸¹

In the year of Óláfr Tryggvason's death, 1000, the Icelandic poet Stefnir Þorgilsson cites a line from Rígsþula that describes the hooked nose of Thrallwoman: he inserts a verb in the present tense and applies the description—'Hooked is the nose . . .'—to the treacherous Danish jarl who had betrayed Óláfr to his death. Stefnir is killed for this: for implicitly satirizing the jarl as both a serf and a woman (see commentary to 10/5), while he names him a traitor.

As other scholars have noted, the theme of the relative status of Jarl and Konungr is one that exercised the minds of men particularly in Norway. The growth of Konungr out of Jarl in Rígsþula solves a Norwegian political problem that first became acute (in recorded Norwegian history) towards the end of the tenth century, when Jarl Hákon inn ríki, 'the powerful', briefly restored the heathen glory of his country—only to be hounded to death by the Christian King Óláfr Tryggvason in 995, as tradition would have it, in a pigsty.⁸²

Jarl Hákon's poets extol him as the restorer of the fecundity and independence of Norway: his divine reward for restoring the temples of the heathen gods. But historians gave him the disrepute of being in his old age a tyrannical womanizer, who ordered the wives and daughters even of men of high standing to be brought to him. Was he restoring in his own fashion the cult practices of Rígr, which may never, in heathen areas, wholly have died out?⁸³ May there have been a contemporary, burlesque version of Rígsþula in which Rígr had an unmistakable resemblance to Jarl Hákon? He is the only ruler of Norway who is represented by eulogizing poets—both Icelanders—not only as a conquering Óðinn and guarding Heimdallr, but also as a giant-defeating Þórr.⁸⁴ Might a fertilizing Rígr have been added to his repertoire? Such a Rígsþula could have been a boisterous mark of appreciation from a grateful people—grateful for his victories over foreign enemies—including the Danes—and proud to have their ancestral religious customs restored. But such a poem could also have been used as a hostile record of senile lechery—aldinn Rígr—by later Christian historians to point the contrast between the heathen Jarl and the Christian Konungr and Saint who succeeded him.

⁸¹ Úlfr Uggason's verses may be dated to the end of the 10 c.; the one lausavísa attributed to him relates to Þangbrandr's missionary visit to Iceland 997–9 (Kristni Saga ch. 9).

⁸² Cf. Ágrip 17, Hkr 1. 295–6; also Hamer for an excellent, fully documented discussion.

If there had been a Rígsþula, lightly adapted for Jarl Hákon, where would it have ended? Would the poets have been allowed to prognosticate a Konr Ungr from Hákon's line? I think it possible that they would. In Hákonar-drápa Hallfreðr draws his tree-image of Hákon as Heimdallr brumaðr hári, 'budded with hair'. Allusion here is to the dream of Hálfðan the Black, Haraldr Fairhair's father—a dream he had in a pigsty—that his hair grew in different lengths and colours, symbolizing his progeny, the longest, brightest lock being St Óláfr Haraldsson.⁸⁵ Hálfðan became the ancestor of kings. I suggest that Hallfreðr was prognosticating the same fortune for Jarl Hákon. And it is possible that he was doing so because he knew it flattered Hákon's own ambition to create a royal dynasty. The poetic notion that the youngest son of a Jarl should marry the ancestress-to-be of the royal Danish house, and himself become the first king and eponym of kingship in northern lands—actually fathering the traditional eponymous Dan of Denmark—could have been 'thought up' as a charming political plaisanterie at the expense of the Danes whom Hákon had diabolically defeated at Hjörungavágr c. 980.⁸⁶ Out of this witty structure the amiable Konr Ungr of the extant poem could well have emerged, through the imagination of a somewhat later poet, who no longer cared for the Viking world.

Of Jarl Hákon's great court poets, who give us the only deep insights we shall ever get into his politics and his propaganda, three are Icelanders—Einarr skálaglamm, Hallfreðr vandræðaskáld, and Eilífr Goðrúnarson.

⁸³ Compare the longevity of the horse-phallus cult in remote northern Norway, according to Vplsa Þáttir.

⁸⁴ In the Þórsdrápa of Eilífr Goðrúnarson. See Davidson 555–65.

⁸⁵ Fagrsk 58. It is ironic that Hálfðan should have a prophetic dream of his brilliant Christian progeny in a pigsty, while Jarl Hákon, also in a pigsty, should dream, just as accurately, not only of his own death, but of the death of his son. The similar scenarios suggest a deliberate parallelism designed by the Christian creators of early Norwegian history, in order to contrast the dynastic futures of the two dreamers. This again may suggest the existence of a tradition that Jarl Hákon had ambitions of a kingdom for his sons.

⁸⁶ The battle is most dramatically told in Jónsvíkinga Saga 35–8; cf. Hkr 1. 279–85.

And it is in Iceland that we have evidence that Rígsþula was known. I have already mentioned Úlfr Uggason's and Stefnir Þorgilsson's reliance upon it. In three family sagas there are references to it: (a) in a lausavísa in Víga-Glúms Saga there is an allusion to Jarl's conquest of land by fighting (38); (b) in a lausavísa in Eyrbyggja Saga Björn Breiðvíkingakappi notes the fierce Jarl-like eyes of his own bloodthirsty little son; (c) in Njáls Saga Hallgerðr mocks Bergþóra for her thrall-like kartnegl (8), and the travelling women make fun of Njáll 'working hard at sitting down', as aged and impotent as Ái by the hearth (2)—and as easily cuckolded—and give an exaggerated picture of the Njálssons getting ready their war-gear, like Jarl and his sons (36, 43; cf. 28). It would seem that Rígsþula—especially for its caricatures of Þræll and Jarl—must have been a most popular poem in Iceland in the thirteenth century.⁸⁷

Because of this undoubted fact it is difficult to accept the suggestion (see von See (a), 12) that the poem might have been inspired by the consolidation of the Norwegian throne under King Hákon (1217–63), after the precautionary crowning of Hákon ungi (Jarl Skúli's grandson) and the defeat and death of the Jarl in the same year (1240). The circumstances—Jarl Skúli had proclaimed himself king—do not fit the poem, and the events themselves are sombre and painful, as Hákon's Icelandic biographer, Sturla Þórðarson, clearly shows. The Queen, the Jarl's daughter, deeply felt the tragic nature of her position and would not have forgiven a poet who treated so lightly the fate of her magnificent father. Nor would his many Icelandic friends.⁸⁸

The poet's familiar use of Völsung traditions⁸⁹ does not offer sound evidence for composition of the poem in the thirteenth century. Though the written form of Völsunga Saga may be c. 1260, much of the Sigmundr–Sigurðr material was known in England far earlier than that, on the evidence of Beowulf,⁹⁰ and of the eleventh century stone carving at ⁸⁷ See UD (e), 62–3, 67–8; (d), 11; commentary to 8/6. By kartnegl Hallgerðr may, in her tortuous way, be suggesting several things at once: (a) that Bergþóra looks like a serf-woman (her status as mistress of the house is not immediately evident to visitors, cf. Njáls 95–6); (b) that she has led a promiscuous life, having children by more manly men than Njáll; and (c) that she now suffers from venereally diseased nails (see commentary to 8/6); this seems excessive, but Hallgerðr enjoys fantastically scurrilous jokes. For a possible borrowing from Ríg in Guðr II see commentary to 41/6–7; the date of Guðr II is uncertain, but most scholars would probably place it (with its various accretions) well before 1200.

⁸⁸ See Hákonar Saga Hákonarsonar, especially chs. 189, 206–7, 225, 239–42. Snorri's last words, as he faces his killers (1241): Eigi skal hoggva, 'You must not hack (my face)' (Sturl (a) i. 454) are thought to be a deliberate echo of Skúli's last words (1240): Hoggvit eigi í andlit mér, þvíat þat er eigi siðr at gora við höfðingja, 'Do not hack at my face—it is not customary to do so to chieftains' (234). Snorri, like Skúli, was killed by Hákon's 'men'. For discussion of Hákon and Jarl Skúli see Blackall ch. 4 (esp. 286–306).

⁸⁹ See commentary to 35/8 and 44/3–8.

⁹⁰ See Beowulf 874–97 (allusions to Sigemund—Wælses eafra—and Fitela, and the vivid succinct

Winchester of Sigmundr and the honey-loving she-wolf.⁹¹ Ragnars Saga, an extension of the Völsung tradition, may also have been known in oral form to the poet: he could have borrowed Jarl's snake-like eyes (35) from Sigurðr Snake-in-the-Eye, Ragnarr's grandson, though the present text of the saga is clearly influenced by Rígsþula itself. The story of Ragnarr and his invading Viking sons has a historical base in ninth century northern England; its legendary elaborations could well have developed there, where the army of the Danish Vikings settled.⁹²

I have suggested a long perspective of poetic history for Rígsþula, with two specific identification points, the ambitions, c. 986, of the heathen Jarl Hákon in Norway and the gentler ideals, c. 1020, of a Norse poet who knew the increasingly busy Anglo-Danish world of Christian England. I have used for these suggestions only what fragments of record there are, which I could interpret as evidence. Others may find better evidence for other suggestions.

I have said 'a Norse poet'. We have no evidence that he was not an Icelander. But Icelanders are the best documented vernacular poets of the period, continuing as the court skáld of the early Christian kings of Norway and Denmark long after the last recorded Norwegian court poet of genius, Eyvindr skáldaspillir—who composed the Háleygjatal for Jarl Hákon—passes out of record. Renowned Icelandic poets stayed at the courts of Anglo-Saxon kings—Egill with King Æðelstan, Gunnlaugr with King Æðelred. Gunnlaugr also presented a drápa to King Sigtrygg Ólafsson kvárans in Dublin.⁹³ At the end of the twelfth century it was still to Icelandic poets and their reciters that Saxo turned for ancient heroic-historical traditions.⁹⁴ Norse poets of other origins are less easy to find.

If I have suggested too long a poetic history for Rígsþula, being persuaded by the archaic nature of some of the Norse–Celtic material, what alternative should we envisage? Would we have had the same seamless integration of Norse–Celtic themes if, for example, the old Irish foster-mother of Melkorka had come to Hjarðarholt⁹⁵ while Úlfr was working on dragon-fight). A date for the poem well before 1000 is indicated by the impressive evidence assembled by Lapidge and by Clemoes (xiii: 'In ch. 1 I set out my case, based on a range of diverse correspondences, for attributing the composition of Beowulf probably to Mercian royal circles in the second quarter of the eighth century—in Aethelbald's reign rather than Offa's.').

⁹¹ See Biddle (a); English Romanesque Art 1066–1200, 150–1. It is hardly possible to doubt Biddle's identification of the subject of the sculpture.

⁹² See ASC 876 (A): 'In that year Healfdene [in later legend Ragnarr's son] shared out Northumberland, and they were busy ploughing and providing for themselves' (þý geara Healfdene Norþanhymbra lond gedælde. 7 ergende wæron 7 hiera tilgende). See McTurk (b), 1–6, on the historical complexities behind the legend.

⁹³ See Egil 128–47, 194–5; Gunnlaugs Saga 70–6; Hofmann 21–148.

⁹⁴ See Saxo, Praefatio 1 § 4, History i. 5 (5).

⁹⁵ See Laxd 51, 58–9, 80. I assume that Óláfr pái would act as interpreter.

his Húsdrápa, and had discussed her Irish legends with him, and compared them with his Norse legends, and in the course of discussion had added some Irish suggestions to an Icelandic version of Rígsþula—including perhaps the name Rígr for the god?—which Úlfr—or a fellow poet who happened to be there—then incorporated into the oral Icelandic text . . . Would this Rígsþula have become the poem that we have? I do not think so.

11. The Text and Metre of Rígsþula

A. The text

The forty-nine surviving stanzas of Rígsþula are written on two sides of a vellum leaf, forming pages 155–6 of the Codex Wormianus (see Vsp Introd III. A). Before this leaf several leaves have been lost and replaced by blank paper leaves. After the Rígsþula leaf more vellum leaves have been lost and blank paper leaves inserted. Rígsþula has therefore no specific context surviving in the MS. It was perhaps chosen for inclusion in a MS. containing Skáldskaparmál because it contributed to the heiti of the human classes.⁹⁶ I would suggest that no more than twelve stanzas may have been lost, so succinct is the poet.

The surviving text can be seen to derive from a good copy. The principal scribal flaws occur in the repetition of refrain stanzas, but, as these stanzas are so well preserved in their first occurrence, the problem is not difficult to solve. I shall consider it first, because the solution of it clarifies the structure of the poem and gives a more assured context for the consideration of other textual flaws.

The three episodes of Rígr's visits (which I shall refer to as Thrall, Carl, and Earl) all have a similar programme and contain three refrain stanzas, first written out in Thrall 3, 5, 6. The third of these refrain stanzas (Thrall 6), in which Rígr stays three nights, leaves the homestead, and time then passes on for nine months, causes no problem (except for the slip in Carl 20, where the two lines noting Rígr's departure, 20/3–4, are omitted). But the first two of the refrain stanzas (cf. 3, 5) are closely similar and repetition has caused confusion. They begin with the same seven words: Rígr kunni þeim / ráð at segia. / Meirr . . . and end with the same six words: en á hlið hvára / hión salkynna. Only the tiny differences in the remaining four words, at the centre of the stanza, tell us whether Rígr is sitting down to eat or lying down to sleep.

⁹⁶ On a vellum fragment (called Wb by Bugge (a), 141 n.) bound into W, is written þræla heiti standa i rigs þvkv. This establishes the traditional name of the poem. For detailed contents of W see AM Katalog I. 213–15.

In Carl 17, after the expected introduction to the first refrain stanza, Rígr kunni þeim / ráð at segia, the expected sitting down between the couple is omitted, as well as the expected account of the meal itself, except for the expected last two lines (cf. 3/5–6), in which Rígr rises from the meal and prepares to sleep. The text of Carl then continues without the expected introduction to the second refrain stanza, Rígr kunni þeim / ráð at segia, but with the remaining lines of the second refrain stanza, in which Rígr lies down (cf. 5/3–6).

In Earl 30, the first refrain stanza is repeated, in its expected place: Rígr takes his seat before the meal (cf. 3). The meal then follows (31–2). Then, ineptly, the sequence of the MS. text of Carl 17–18 follows (i.e. 17/1–2 and 18/9–10 only), so that in Earl the two lines appropriate to the opening of the second refrain stanza, Rígr kunni þeim / ráð at segia, come before the two lines in which Rígr rises from the meal and prepares to sleep, not after (cf. 4/9–10 followed by 5/1–2). In Earl the four remaining lines of the second refrain stanza, in which Rígr actually lies down between the couple, are then omitted (cf. 5/3–6).

I would suppose that the confusion in the presentation of the first two refrain stanzas in Carl and Earl arises from inadequate signalling of the 'repeats' in Carl and Earl of the full text given in Thrall, at some stage of the poem's written transmission. To abbreviate only the first (two) line(s) of the first and second refrain stanzas would not be sufficient to distinguish them. In the MS. Carl and Earl have a complete text of only one of the first two refrain stanzas. In Carl, however, the two opening lines, which are common to both the first and the second refrain stanzas, are separated from lines 3–6 of the second refrain stanza not only by a lacuna (18/1–8 reconstructed), but by the last two lines of the otherwise lost stanza 18 (18/9–10). The error in Carl cannot therefore be a simple one, in which the scribe's eye has slipped from the two opening lines of the first refrain stanza to the last four of the second refrain stanza. It is conceivable that at some stage in the written transmission the two lines in which Rígr leaves the meal and prepares to sleep were taken to be the correct opening of the second refrain stanza, when Rígr places himself miðrar rekkiu, between the married couple.

It is noticeable that in Earl the line equivalent to MS. 4/10 and 18/10 (rēðz/rēð at sofna) is quite different from them in its wording: rekkiu gerði MS. 32/12. This is the phrase used of Præll and Pír 'making a bed' together without the formalities of a higher class marriage (11/6). It seems unsuited to an honoured guest or to the formality of Rígr himself. I suggest that a scribe, supposing the last four lines of the second refrain not to be indicated in the copy before him (and, therefore, not putting them in his own copy: cf. 33 reconstructed), altered the phrase rēð(z) at sofna to rekkiu gerði simply in order to supply the necessary information that Rígr here actually went to bed—cf. miðrar rekkiu: information otherwise lost from the text at this point. Refrain stanza 34, which he writes immediately after rekkiu gerði—Par var hann at þat, ‘There (i.e. in bed) he was then’—follows now with better coherence than if réd(z) at sofna had preceded. No doubt it was in order to secure this coherence that he reversed the order of the last two lines of the meal stanza 32 and the first two lines of the second refrain, which I suppose were signalled in the text before him.

Taking MS. 32/12 rekkiu gerði to be a scribal alteration and not the original text, I have supplied 4/10 in its place. I have taken 4/10 to be intended as an unchanging refrain line and have accordingly emended réd to rédz in 18/10. The emendation is supported by the reflexive form of two of his other refrain-like actions: settiz 3/3, [17/3], 30/3; lagðiz 5/3, 19/3, [33/3].

It is noticeable that the line preceding rédz at sofna is in each of the three occurrences different. The differences are dependent upon the preceding context:

1. 4/9 reads Reis hann upp þaðan, where þaðan, ‘from there’, refers to biðð, ‘table’, 4/8 (this is added confirmation that the two lines in the MS. intervening between 4/8 and 4/9 are incorrectly placed; see commentary to 4/8).

2. 18/9 reads Reis frá borði, since (if the text transferred from MS. stanza 4 is correctly placed) there is no immediately preceding reference to a table from which Rígr might rise.

3. 32/11 reads Reis Rígr at þat, where at þat, ‘then’, is a time reference relating to the statement in 32/10 that ‘the day was passing’. Evidently the line in which Rígr rises after each meal is not intended to be repeated as an identical refrain line. It is a contextually varying bridge line to the refrain line rédz at sofna, and requires no standardization.

Since the line in which Rígr rises from the meal is, in all three occurrences, linked by verbal reference to the preceding line of the meal stanza, it is unlikely that the MS. line order in Carl and Earl (in which the refrain lines Rígr kunni þeim / ráð at segja are placed before the line in which Rígr rises from the meal, see reconstructed text 17–19, 32–3) represents the intention of the poet.

Scribal misreading could account for the omissions in 7/3–5: first, the similarity of hprvi and hprund causing haplography from hprvi to svartan; then the continued alliteration from hprvi to hétu making another line alliterating on h unnecessary, and, therefore, perhaps unnoticed. In the sequence of four lines alliterating on h in 48/5–8, the third line also has been omitted.

In 8/4–10 the headlong pace of the brief paratactic lines could have caused the omission, in recital, or in writing, of one of the seven. That the rarest word, kartnegl, should be the one omitted, would be understandable.

The omission of Amma’s meal must have been a scribal error. A reciter at any stage of transmission would not have forgotten it; for him it would be a key stanza in his entertainment. It might have been after the omission of Amma’s meal that the distinctive lines, Var kálfr soðinn, / krása beztr, then found their way into Edda’s meal, after 4/8, fortuitously recalled by a scribe.

Another regrettable lacuna occurs at 45/2–6, partly filled in, I suggest, with three unoriginal lines (45/2–4). Interpolation of unoriginal lines appears to occur also after 23/6. These questionable lines, as well as minor editorial corrections to the text, are considered in the commentary.

B. The metre

The handling of stanza-form in Rígsþula is a marvel of versatility. The length of the stanzas varies considerably, from four lines at one extreme (47) to fourteen (12) at the other. The eighteen six-line stanzas include the nine refrain stanzas and are most frequent in the first half of the poem, but when Rígr’s visits, and the refrain stanzas that celebrate them, are over (that is, after 34), the eight-line stanza becomes noticeably predominant. Of the seventeen eight-line stanzas, eight occur between stanzas 35 and 49 (i.e. 35, 39, 40, 41, 44, 46, 48, 49; the defective stanza 45 may well have been an eight-line stanza also). It would seem that, as the ritualistic element faded, and the romantic story of Konr Ungr developed, the eight-line stanza was preferred. Was this because of its traditional ease in blending narrative and dialogue? The crow’s words are the first directly spoken in the poem: were there more to come?⁹⁷

The one four-line stanza, 47, may be regarded as a traditional variation within a series of eight-line stanzas (cf. Atlakviða 10, 18, 20, 22, 31; Hamðismál 16, 23).

The eleven longer stanzas throw light upon the poet’s way of working. Of the seven ten-line stanzas (excluding 18), four are in effect eight-line stanzas with a refrain-like addition at beginning or end. So 2/1–2 is identical with lines 3–4 of the third refrain stanza (i.e. 6, 20, 34). Perhaps the poet wished to introduce the phrase miðrar brautar before Rígr’s visits began (see commentary to 2/2). In 4, the last two lines provide a refrain link with the last two lines of 18 and 32. In 8, the first two lines are a refrain repeated in 22/1–2; 36/1–2 are a variant upon it. In 13, the last two lines are a refrain repeated in 25/7–8.

⁹⁷ This is a very difficult question to think of a satisfactory answer to. The speechless speed of the preceding action would be lost if the human dialogue developed. I am inclined to think it did not.

In the remaining three ten-line stanzas the use of the two additional lines is more individual. In 16, after a well-rounded description of an energetic housewife at work in eight lines, two closing lines abruptly divulge the identity and property value of Afi and Amma: a statement stylistically detached, but totally relevant.

In 37 and 42, eight-line stanzas are internally expanded, ostensibly for the sake of the alliteration, but other poetic benefits accrue. In 37 expansion is by repetition. 37/2 is repeated: Rígr gangandi / Rígr gangandi. This gives weight to the god's sudden appearance out of the trees and enables Jarl's education to be performed peripatetically: the god 'takes it in his stride', as it were, like a good solar deity always having his eye on the clock and the calendar. In 37/8–9 the repetition óðalvöllu / óðalvöllu gives a double significance to the word. The god appears at first to be telling Jarl to get himself some land that can become a patrimony for his descendants (eignaz meaning then simply 'acquire'); when óðalvöllu is repeated as a parallel to aldnar byggðir, however, we see that eignaz really means 'appropriate (someone else's patrimony)'. It is unfortunate that the translation cannot convey this duplicity.

In 42, the names of Jarl's sons are interrupted by two interjections that raise an image of the twelve boys at their peaceful pastimes—games and swimming (the lonely Jarl did not play games, 36). While the interjections certainly aid the alliteration, they also, even more significantly, provide the necessary contrast with the war-like preoccupations of the boys when they are older (43)—growing mature, like their father—and these preoccupations, in turn, are contrasted with Konr Ungr's studious and idle tastes (44, 47). A comparison with the corresponding sequence in Thrall and Carl shows how little the poet is constrained by systematic parallelism. The poet gives no account of the activities of Karl's sons; their names alone (24) suffice to show that they carry on their father's interests (thoroughly listed in 22). In the case of Þræll's sons, however, after listing their expressive names, the poet itemizes their servile activities as a splendid climax to the longest stanza of the poem (12). This is not because their activities are like those of their father, but because they are not. The poet had purposively confined Þræll's activity to gathering firewood for the ancestral hearth (see Ríg Introd n. 19). The broader labours of þræla kyn in the future world had still to be outlined (12/10–14).

The delight in observing the varying length of the stanzas is in the insight it gives into the poet's clarity of mind and swiftness of response to shifts in the detail of his material. So, in 2 and 14, both hús and hóll can alliterate with hurð (an essential item in the narrative), but salr cannot. The happy device of making the wealthiest dwelling face south (26)—suðr horfðu dyrr—leads on to the elegance of the door-ring that will alliterate with the open hurð. That the floor within is strewn with rushes is only to be expected. The expansion of description leads him to allow two stanzas to the entry into Father and Mother's manor, while one sufficed for the homes of the other couples (2, 14).

The poet is always ready to expatiate and diversify nimbly if the occasion inspires him. He has a six-line stanza for Þræll's birth and for Karl's: one line suffices for their colouring and one for their eyes. But Jarl has two lines for his colouring and two for his eyes (cf. 7, 21, 35). I suggest that the elaboration springs initially from the fact that, while Edda and Amma can both alliterate with their offspring, ióð, Móðir cannot. To have a stanza opening with

* Ióð ól Móðer
iósu vatni . . .

would be undistinguished after the swinging assonance of Ióð ól Edda . . . Ióð ól Amma . . . The poet therefore thinks afresh, changes the order of actions, placing the swaddling of the baby before its sprinkling with water, and giving Móðir a sveinn, who can alliterate with the silk she wraps him in.⁹⁸ Jarl's name then alliterates with his sprinkling: iósu. The neat arrangement in Thrall and Carl, whereby the colouring of the baby is conveyed by a masculine adjective (or two) standing as object of vafði, 'wrapped', is, however, lost in Earl, with the new first lines. While the blond hair might need only a single line, Jarl's eyes surely need two. Qtul vóru augu alone would make him a baby monster; the addition of 'like those of a baby snake' just shows him to be a hero in embryo. These last two lines of the stanza were no doubt conceived of from the start (see commentary to 35/8). Between them and the first five lines the need for an extra line gives Jarl his bright cheeks. It is not always, however, such a structural need that gives Jarl his touch of distinction. The poet need not have altered for Jarl the refrain-like opening that describes the growing-up of Þræll and Karl—Hann nam at vaxa / ok vel dafna (8, 22)—but he does. Jarl is given a more sheltered upbringing, within the walls of his parents' manor—Upp óx þar / Iarl á fletjum. The poet is not constrained by a refrain unless he wants to be. And when he wants, he starts up a new echo: the sons grow up in the same phrasing as their father—Upp óxu þar / Iarli berner (43/1–2).

The three twelve-line stanzas are long through exuberance: details of rich food and drink and absorbing talk in 32 (which is in effect a ten-line stanza followed by two refrain-like lines); a relentless agenda of knightly accomplishments in 36; a bravura caricature of heroic war in 38.

When excellent poetic reasons can be seen behind the 'irregularity' of ⁹⁸ Sveinn also has the advantage of being a future Danish king's name. Ióð neut. does not relate only to sons.

stanza-length and refrain-continuity, we must hesitate to suggest that other irregularities in the metrical structure are not the work of the poet and therefore might be amended. Scattered among the regular fornyrðislag lines are several that have only three syllables (4/2, 7/6, 8/4, 7, 10/[5], 6, 11/7, 8, 12/14, 16/2, 3, 10, 18/8, 24/5, 27/3, 29/1, 31/2, 4, 36/1, 38/2, 3, 6, 39/8, 40/5, 42/4, 7, 8, 9, 44/1, 47/1), and three lines that have only two syllables (8/[6], 8/9, 11/4). The three-syllable line is an old variant in fornyrðislag and no doubt springs from oral habit (cf. Atlakviða 6/8, 7/2, 19/5; Hamðismál 2/2, 11/4, 14/3, 15/2, 25/1). By using two or three such lines in a single stanza the poet of Rígspula gives a great impression of speed and fullness. The two-syllable line—the syllables are always long—is rare in Eddic verse. I have noted only two instances, in ljóðaháttir (Hávamál 76, 77: Deyr fé, and (possibly) Hárbarðsljóð 32: Liðs þíns). Together with very frequent alliteration falling on verbs—an old Germanic oral characteristic⁹⁹—the short-syllable lines would seem to show the poet's thorough involvement with—and mastery of—popular poetic styles.

⁹⁹ See Campbell (b), esp. 16–17.

COMMENTARY ON THE TEXT

1/1 Ár: cf. Hym 1/1, Guð 1/1, Sigsk 1/1. Ríg 1 is a deliberate accumulation of traditional expressions leading to the wholly untraditional name Ríg in the final line.

kváðu ganga: for numerous syntactical parallels see LP s.v. kveða § 1.

1/2 grænar brauter: see Nygaard § 96 (a) for acc. of place traversed. Grænar implies 'joyously luxuriant', 'felicitous' (as also OE grêne, cf. Grein s.v.; also Wolf 52). 'Green ways' may be used in anticipation of sexual encounter (cf. Fáf 41, of Sigurðr's path to Guðrún, and the Danish ballad, DgF VII no. 180/2: han véd grøn stie til jomfruens bur, 'he knew green paths to the maiden's bower'). In Pórsdr 1 Loki uses the phrase with deceptive relish.

1/3 øflgan: used of the æsir in Vsp 17/3–4.

aldinn: used of Óðinn in Vsp 28/2.

1/4 kunnigan: nowhere else used of a god in poetic texts. It is conceivable that some play is intended, with allusion to Óðinn, on the rare term reginkunnigr; see commentary to Hamð 25/2.

1/5 ramman: magical as well as physical potency may be implied, cf. rammaukinn, Hyndl 35/3, used of Heimdallr.

rpskvan, 'active', 'manly', 'physically mature'. Egill uses the vb. rpskvask of his dead son: cf. . . . hann rpskvask næði, 'if he had reached his prime', Sonat 11/5–6. Though rpskr is nowhere else used of a god, the closely comparable term þroskr, 'full-grown', 'ripe', is used of Freyr (Skm 38/5); in both contexts fecund virility is the point at issue.

1/6 Ríg: a borrowing of Irish rí(g), 'king', for the purpose of the poem (see Ríg Introd 1. B). That the Irish term was well known among Norsemen is evident from the anecdote, dated in the 11 c., of the Norseman who hailed an Irish king in unfortunately bad Irish: Male diarik ('May you be cursed, King!' instead of 'May you be blessed'), but at least he knew the word for 'king' (Bisk 1. 227). See also Almqvist (b), esp. 85–6, on linguistic contacts. For Norsemen with a smattering of Irish there would be a pun on rígr, 'king', and the native rígr, 'stiffness' (relevant to Heimdallr–Rígr's tree-figure and his phallic role).

2/1 meirr, 'more', might often in the poem be idiomatically rendered 'furthermore' and 'next', but I have kept to the translation 'more' in every instance, as comprehensible enough in either case, in order to maintain the refrain-like emphasis on the word (cf. Fritzner s.v. meirr § 3).

at þat: i.e. 'after that', 'thereupon' (cf. Fritzner s.v. at § 1).

2/2 miðrar brautar: locative gen. (Nygaard § 141); cf. 3/4, 4/6, 5/4. I am not able to determine whether there is a significance attached to miðrar brautar at this point in the poem, apart from its anticipation of Rígr's centrality when he enters human company (see Ríg Introd 1.D. Theme II). Is there any solar significance in the phrase: reference to the central position of the sun in the universe, or at the height of its course at midday, or, more theologically, to Rígr's treading of a course between god and men from which the human king would issue as the central mediator between the divine and human worlds? (see Ríg Introd 1.D. Theme III; also, for some philosophical associations (for an Irishman) of the centrality of the sun, Allard, esp. 98).

2/4 hurð . . . gætti: the movable door (hurð) has been lifted from the entrance-opening (dyrr) and put in the space (gætti) designed for it inside the house, by the side of the wooden framework of the entrance-opening (cf. Privatbol 234–5). The meticulous statement that the entrance has been made open (as in 14/4, 26/5–6) is of thematic significance (see Ríg Introd 1.D. Theme II and nn. 50, 51).

2/8 at arni: on the significance of the hearth in the poet's fable see Ríg Introd 1.D. Theme I (ii) and n. 19. On types of hearth see Privatbol 178. The MS. reading (hár) af árni, 'white-haired' from ? toil' (taking árn as an elsewhere unattested noun related to árna, 'to perform a task'), is unacceptable. For at miswritten af cf. Skm 35/9.

2/9 Ái ok Edda: neither name is found as a proper noun (unlike the names of the two other parental pairs). I suspect that the poet here pressed into service two traditional popular family terms for the older generations. Ái comes from the same root as Afi, 16/9 (with loss of intervocalic -w-; cf. Lat avus, 'ancestor', 'grandfather'; Noreen § 235 n. 4; AEW s.vv. ái, afi. While a term awe*, 'grandfather', does not occur in Gothic records, awo meaning 'grandmother' does; Feist s.v.). Ái occurs outside Ríg as a dwarf-name (Vsp 11/8, 15/6) and as a man-heiti (Pulur IV j 8/1 (Skjald B 1. 662)), but Edda is not found elsewhere until the 14 c. (as a title for SnE and as a term for poetry in the ancient style; see PE 1. xiii). It could have originated as a pet name for the oldest 'mother' of a family, deriving from the archaic ON eiða, 'mother' (with shortening of the diphthong and consonantal doubling; Noreen offers parallels for such a formation, §§ 128, 238. 1a; cf. Gothic aipei, 'mother', Feist s.v.; OHG fuotar eidi, 'foster mother'; SnE 190, 216; LP s.v.). I think it improbable that Edda in Ríg has a learned origin (cf. Faulkes (a)). The terms langafi, langamma for the great-grandparents (cf. langfeðrar, 'ancestors') do not appear in medieval tradition.

2/10 aldinfalda: hap. leg.; aldin-, 'aged', is not elsewhere found in a compound, while -falda, an adjectival formation from faldr, 'head-dress', is found elsewhere

only in the giantess-name Sveipinfalda, 'Swooping-hood' (so Vigfússon s.v.; Pulur IV c 3/8 (Skjald B 1. 659)). I have interpreted aldinfalda as 'wearing a faldr suitable for an old woman', and assumed it would be a simple swathed cap (rather than 'an old-fashioned faldr', as in Ljunggren 13, since this hardly fits the Urzeit context); cf. commentaries to 16/5, 29/1. (FJ's emendation of MSS. 'folk'- to fald- in Vell 37 is unacceptable; Davidson 413–14).

3/2 ráð has been made the refrain-like keyword for all Rígr's gifts to mankind; its range of usage evokes many meanings in little space: 'counsel', 'plan', 'decision', 'marriage' (in pl.), 'sexual union (without marriage)'. Even the meanings 'living conditions', 'household' would not be irrelevant, so comprehensive are the benefits of Rígr's visits. The range of meaning is well illustrated in both Vigfússon and Fritzner s.v.; only Fritzner § 13 distinguishes unmarried sexual union. Note the use of ráð of Hákon's relationship with the land of Norway, Hák 7, and excellent commentary by Davidson, 504–6 and discussion, 464–71. See Ríg Introd 1.E on ráðgegninn in Húsr 2.

3/4 fletia: the raised flooring of wood round the earth floor (gólf), which served for seating and sleeping. I have used the translation 'bench' whenever it is a question of sitting (e.g. in the refrain stanzas), but 'benches' (36/2), when the whole accommodating hall is implied, where a child might be watched over; cf. Privatbol 212–17.

3/6 salkynna is used in Eddic poems (other than Ríg) only of the homes of giants—Gymir and Gerðr, Vafþrúðnir—or of Óðinn (Skm 17, 18; Vafþ 3 (salakynni); Grim 9, 10). Except in Ríg, salkynni is the object of inspection: visitors come to see the 'nature, quality' (-kynni as in húsakynni, i.e. húsakostr, cf. Fritzner s.v. húsakynni) of Óðinn's or of Vafþrúðnir's dwelling. The slight anomaly of usage in Ríg suggests that the poet was taking an old poetic term out of its conventional context (and metre, i.e. alliteration on siá or sé, in a ljóðaháttir line) for the sake of its archaic associations with the unreal homes of myth. It is also possible that the poet, by his reuse of the term in the new context, was attempting to shift the conventional sense of -kynni in salkynni to that of 'family': so, hión salkynna, 'the man and wife (parents) of the family (to be) of the house' (cf. Fritzner s.v. kynni § 2).

4/2 ökkevinn, 'swollen', 'bulging' (cf. Ökkevinkálfa, 13/3), related to ModÍcel ökkur, OHG anguueiz(o), 'swelling', 'tumour', 'boil' (cf. Lat inguen). Whether 'auckast', used in Thomas Saga 359/3, of the agglomerating of wet mud on walkers' feet, should be etymologically linked with ökkevinn, is uncertain (cf. Vigfússon s.v. ökvast; Íslensk orðsifjabók s.v. ökvast). A verse in Völpa Þáttur shows knowledge of Ríg 4/2–3: the thrall of the farmer's household is speaking, taking hold of the swelling equine phallus with distaste: Hleifr væri mér / hálfu sæmri, / þykkir ok ökkevinn / . . . en Völpi þessi, 'A thick and bulging loaf would be to me twice as tasteful . . . as this Völpi/phallus' (Flat II. 334). The analogy between rising bread and sexual tumescence is one of the few jokes that survive in OE (cf. Riddle 45 (ASPR III. 205); Williamson 282–3). On bread types in Ríg see commentary to 18/1–4.

4/4 sáðum: I have interpreted sáðir here as 'coarsely ground grains from which the outer skin (the bran) had not been separated', rather than as 'bran' alone, (a) in order to convey the bumpy texture implied, and (b) to avoid the implication that Ái and Edda had more than one style of flour-grinding. Wealthier households might deliberately blanda agnar eða sáðir við brauð . . . til þess at þá sé drjúgari fæzla en áðr, 'mix chaff or bran with the bread . . . so that the food should then be more substantial than before' (Konungs Skuggsjá 51); but Ái and Edda would not, I suggest, have this choice. The emphasis on the primary significance of 'the loaf' of bread in the human household, here and 31/6 (and no doubt originally also in 18/2), is seen most conspicuously in the OE terms for the lord and lady of a house: hlāford, 'loaf-guardian', hlāfdige, 'loaf-kneader'.

4/5–6 Bar — skutla: I have taken these enigmatic lines to mean that Edda brought in the loaf in three portions in the centre of three dishes. The broth would then be poured on the portions of bread. DH take it that Edda brought a bowl of broth in the middle of a serving dish (taking skutla as poetic pl. for sg.) and then set it on the table. SG assume that an object of bar must be supplied or understood: 'she brought further food . . .'.

4/7 soð is given to the pigs in heroic verse (HH II 39/7).

4/8 After 4/8 the MS. reads var kálfr soðinn / krása beztr. As many scholars think, these lines may well have belonged originally to the lost stanza 18, describing Amma's meal. I have placed it (18/7–8) in a reconstructed version of the stanza. The words soð (4/7) and soðinn (18/7) may have created a memory link that attracted the later lines into Edda's meal. Oxen—and their calves—go with karlakyn and their ploughs (22/3–4, 8), not with Þræll's parents.

4/9–10 To avoid abruptness in reading I have left a space before these lines (also before 18/9–10 and 32/11–12). I do not think any text is missing here.

6/2 priár nætr: on the three wedding nights of marital chastity see Ríg Introd 1. D. Theme II and n. 44; also Skm 42.

7/2 On pre-Christian customs of baptism by water see AR § 137; Háv 158; Maurer 6 ff.; Lexikon für Theologie s.v. Wasser 1.

7/3–4 Hqrvi — svartan: with other editors, I assume that by haplography vafði hqrund has been omitted (cf. 35/2). Rióðan, 21/5, and bjarter vangar, 35/6, refer to complexion; hqrundsvartan would be stylistically parallel (cf. hqrundbjartir (-mjúkr), 'radiant (soft) of flesh, body'). I cannot find any direct evidence (other than Ríg 7/3 itself) that hqr was a coarser type of linen than ripti (21/4, 23/6) or lín (41/4). Hqr is not recorded in the (prose of the) Íslendinga Sögur, Heimskringla, or Sturlunga Sögur (I thank Sverrir Tómasson for sending me this information from the lexical records of the Stofnun Árna Magnússonar); it may, therefore, have been out of fashion for clothing by the 13 c., perhaps because it was not as fine as modern taste required. The presumably contemptuous alliterative linking of hqr eðr hempi (used of underclothes) in Konungs Skuggsjá 45 (c. 1260) suggests the same (as, indeed, does the use of hqr for a tablecloth by Móðir, 31/3). In skaldic and Eddic tradition (other than Ríg), however, hqr is used of admired women's clothing: young Brynhildr is hqrskrjidd, 'gloriously dressed in hqr', Sigs 51/2; see LP s.v. hqr § 1. The statement in KLNM s.v. Lin (col. 579) that hqr was not used of clothing ('Lin betegner både plante, råstoff og produkt, mens hqr bare ble brukt om uarbeidet råstoff, ikke om tøy') does not take account of this Old Icelandic poetic tradition.

7/5 Hqfug vóru augu: I have supplied for Þræll eyes that are the extreme opposite of Iarls, namely, heavy, closing with sleep (cf. hqfgi, 'sleepiness', 'dozing'). I have followed the alliterative precedent of 40/7–8. Sleep would seem to be the serf's one blessing for which a king will envy him (e.g. Shakespeare, 2 Henry IV, III. i. 9–17, Henry V, IV. i. 280–301).

7/6 héttu Þræl: on the importance attached to name-giving see AR §§ 138, 158.

8/2 dafna, 'to thrive physically' (especially of babies, as Vigfússon s.v. notes; cf. Old Icelandic döfnunarbarn). The related OE gedafenian is only used in an abstract sense, 'to be fitting, decorous'. Whether ON dafna implies 'to grow up in proper form' is not possible to determine from the recorded instances, but it seems likely. If so, to apply the term to Þræll is sadly, but deliberately, ironic. The phrase vaxa né vel dafna (of a baby) in Egils Saga einhenda 176, ch. 12, is no doubt an echo of Ríg. In Egill Skalla-Grimsson's lausavísa 24 (Egil 149) the MSS. read drafnar not dafnar (as SG, following Skjald B I. 45).

8/6 kartnegl: I have adopted Grundtvig's suggestion, but without his addition of adj. liótir, 'ugly', since there are other two-syllable lines in the poem (see 8/9, 11/4; JH 100; Bugge (a), 403). Elsewhere in ON kartnegl is found only in Njál 91, where, I suggest, it is deliberately borrowed from Ríg by the saga author, to form part of Hallgerðr's mockery of Bergþóra. What precise ailment kartnegl designates is difficult to determine. Matthiesen notes the post-medieval use of kartneglur for deformed, brittle, or split nails, and nails afflicted by the ringworm fungus, which causes an itching popularly associated with sexual excess. Kartnegl on Þræll would arise from hard work and poverty: so the poet would imply (for references see Ríg Introd n. 87).

8/9 lotr: hap. leg., an ablaut variant of (if not a scribal error for) lútr, 'stooping'. As Lútr occurs as a personal name in 12/9, it seems to me unlikely that the poet would use exactly the same word in 8/9.

8/10 langer hæl were evidently regarded as a physical defect, or at least unattractive, if we judge by the exhortations at babies' christenings in the old days in Denmark, to encourage the guests to drink well: Drik ud—ellers faar Barnet lange Hæle, 'Drink up—or the child will get long heels' (cf. Hansen, who suggests that 'long heels' imply a slow, trailing gait. There could be racial reference also; cf. the difference between the slender Romano-Celtic and the broader Anglo-Saxon feet as seen in skeletal remains from excavated graves in south-west England, discussed by P. Jackson.

9/6 hrís: branches cut from small trees and bushes; cf. Fritzner s.v. § 2; Vkv 8/7; Ríg Introd n. 19.

gerstan dag: so also Skm 30/2. The sense is determined by Sigvatr Þórðarson's description of the hostile eyes of the Gautland bóndi who drove him from his doors: leit við mér . . . gerstr (Hkr II. 138, Skjald B I. 222). Þræll labours in a wintry, unfriendly landscape to provide warmth (well illustrated in Les Très Riches Heures du Duc de Berry for Février).

10/2–4 gengilbeina: hap. leg. I take the sense to be 'a girl whose legs are constantly walking' (cf. OE Maxims I 64 (ASPR III. 159): widgongel wif word gespringeð, 'of a woman who goes walking far and wide, gossip will grow'). Þír is, as it were, a humble, pedestrian version of Nerthus or St Brigida (see Ríg Introd I. D. Theme II). To Þræll's winter scene of bare branches she brings fertile earth (aurr; see commentary to Vsp 19/4) from a sunny climate; her harvesting in the sun has turned her bare arms brown. For the enslaved giant-girls turning the golden mill in Grott (16/5–6) the aurr of their prison is an icy mud that eats into their feet—aurr etr iliar—while cold—kulði—falls from above upon them, not sunshine. Þír does not, like them, bring a destructive future, but a golden one. The poet, by his verbal touches, seems to have planned the poetic allusion and contrast.

10/5 niðrbiúgt nef: I adopt Ljunggren's excellent suggestion (13–17) that the vb. er should be omitted on the analogy of the preceding line (and 8/5–10, 29/3–8). A witch-like nose, curving down over the mouth, is a monstrous feature in fornaldarsögur (see Lehmann 20, n. 127, with the valuable citation from Knytinga Saga 127, ch. 20: Knútr var . . . manna fríðastr, nema nef hans var þunnt ok eigi lágt ok nökkut bjúgt, 'Knútr was the handsomest of men, except that his nose was thin and prominent and rather curved (or bent)'). The horn said to grow on the Hornfinnar was niðrbjúgt í enni, 'growing down over the forehead', Hkb 167/8; see Fritzner s.v. niðrbjúgr. The point of the satiric lines of Stefniir Þorgilsson—Niðrbiúgt er nef / á niðingi, 'Hooked is the nose of the traitor'—would seem to be the implication that this particular traitor—the Danish Jarl Sigvaldi, who plotted the death of Óláfr Tryggvason at Svoldr in 1000—was no Jarl, but the lowest class of man, a Thrall: if not, indeed—adding sexual scorn—a Thrall woman. Stefniir (I suggest) deliberately cites Ríg for his mockery, which was evidently poisonous enough for the jarl to have him killed (Oddr Snorrason, Óláfs Saga 194–5). I can see a point in Stefniir's citation of Ríg, but none in any poet's borrowing of Stefniir's line for Þír (as Heusler and others suggest; SG). If Jarl Sigvaldi did in fact have a hooked nose (which gave Stefniir his idea), the joke would be perfect. Familiarity with Stefniir's kviðlingr may have led a scribe of Ríg to insert the vb. er.

11/4 sonr húss: see commentary to 16/10.

11/6 rekkiu gøðu: that Þræll and Þír have no marriage ceremony (cf. 23, 41) no doubt reflects Norse heathen customs of informal marital alliances between thralls, without legal force. Grágás, however, provides certain rights for married thralls (Ia. 191, II. 397, III. 710), which might derive from pre-Christian times.

11/8 þrungin dægr: acc. of duration, 'through days and nights that followed thick and fast upon each other and were crammed with things to do'. I do not think the primary sense of the phrase is 'oppressed, sad, days and nights' (cf. LP s.v. þryngva), especially since the cheerful lines 12/1–2 follow immediately. Echoing his earlier use of þrunginn (4/4) to describe the primitive loaf packed with heavy nourishment—drjúg fæðsla, as the author of Konungs Skuggsjá calls it—the poet presents the thralls' life as 'action-packed', under heavy pressure, no doubt, but not miserable: begetting children at night and working hard at householding in the daytime. Coming so closely after the phrase rekkiu gøðu (11/6), þrunginn also raises associations of sexual embrace, þrong (cf. hvíluþrong, 'embrace in bed', Gísl 33; see commentary to Lks 30/4–6).

12/4–9 Hreimr — Leggjalði: I have invented a translation of the names according to the nearest meaningful Norse word; e.g. hreimr, 'noise'; frós, 'cow-byre'; klúrr, 'ill-formed', 'coarse'; klegg, 'sticky lump', 'horse-fly'; kefsir, 'servile sleeping-partner'; full, 'putrid', 'ugly'; drumbr, 'stump' (cf. trédrumbr, 'tree-stump'; Fritzner s.v.); digr, 'fat'; drötr, 'sluggard' (cf. dratta, 'to drag (oneself) along'); hoss, 'grey'; lúta, 'to stoop'; leggjar, 'limbs', 'legs' (cf. á legg kominn, '(newly) grown up'). To associate the name Leggjalði (which occurs also as a nickname, Landn 330) with leggja vb. and the fixing of fences in 12/10 (as LP s.v.) is unsatisfactory: the vb. is too general in application to provide a nickname. Leggr occurs as a personal name and as a nickname; Lind s.v. suggests that Leggjalði probably implies 'with notable legs (admirable or otherwise)'. These yokel-names, though emphasizing uncouthness and premature signs of age—Hqssver, Lútr—do not point to any lack of food.

12/14 grófu torf: the association of peat-digging with a thrall's life reappears in the (prose) traditions of the Orkney jarl, Torf-Einarr (c. 890), who was said to be the first to dig peat in the Orkneys. Torf-Einarr was the son of Jarl Rognvaldr of Mœrr, who despised him because his mother came wholly of thrall ancestry (í allar ættir þrælborin, Orkneyinga Saga 11).

13/2–8 Drumba — Trpnubeina: there is a greater element of raillery, directed against personal appearance, in the daughters' names. Not only their shapeless plumpness (Drumba, cf. 12/7, and Kumba, cf. kumbi, 'block of wood'), but their legs (Økkvinkálfa and Trpnubeina) have caught attention, and the beak-like nose inherited from mother (Arinnefia; I take Arin- as a variant of Arn-, 'eagle', as in Arinbjörn, rather than as 'Hearth(-nose)', a possible variant of 'Cinderella'. On Arin-/Arn- see Beck 28–30; commentary to Akv 1/7 (3)). Ysia would rush noisily about her tasks (cf. yss, 'uproar', 'bluster'; AEW s.v.), while Eikintiasna was a mighty chatterbox (cf. Skm 17/5; Norw tjasna, 'to talk endlessly', cf. AEW s.v. tjasna § 2).

Ambátt and Tptryghypia (a wretched giant's daughter in HHI 43) represent the subservience and poverty of their class.

14/2 réttar: of the various shades of meaning of réttar involved here I have given priority to 'right' in the translation (see Ríg Introd 1. D. Theme II), though 'direct' and 'straight' are no doubt also implied, because, of course, Rígr knows exactly the way he is going.

14/4 hurð — skíði: here the door has been raised to rest on the lintel-beam (skíð; cf. Fritzner 1972 s.v. dyraskíð; Privatbol 234) by ropes or chains.

15/3–5 That Afi is given net clipped hair and slim-fitting garment strengthens the impression of precision and care made by the image of him carving. The scene looks ahead to the practical creative interests of his son and the conspicuous beards and respectable persons of his grandsons (22, 24). On early medieval attitudes to the cutting of beards see Constable 85–102 ('The Laity'); also Konungs Skuggsjá 46, trans. 182.

skyrta þröngva: SG (supplementing Nygaard § 31) note the stylistic habit of omitting, in a descriptive sequence, the vb. 'to have on, be wearing', moving from a nom. with vb. 'to be' (skpr var fyr enni) to an ungoverned acc. (skyrta). The same device occurs in 29/3–4.

15/6 Skokkr: 'As a nautical term in ON, skokkr is confined to skaldic poetry, and in none of the six contexts in which it occurs is its precise reference clear. But, partly on the basis of etymology and partly by inference from the use of skokk in Swedish dialect, it has been established that skokkr is virtually synonymous with biljur, designating the loose decking planks on the bottom of the ship' (Edwards 312, commentary to Porfinnsdrápa 20/8: skokkr var blóði stokkinn; with references to Lindquist, Ljunggren 26–8). As Ljunggren points out, comparison is between the styles of gólf in Ríg 2, 15, 27; skokkr is then most aptly interpreted as the treadway of boards often placed on the earthen floor alongside the raised flooring (with its benches and beds) so that feet could be free from ash and mud (see Privatbol 181–2, 219). ModIcel skokkr, 'small box', is less fitting.

16/3 breiddi faðm: as LP notes, s.v. breiða, Axel Kock's interpretation is 'unnecessary'. He takes faðm as OHG fadum, 'thread' (not found in ON) and breiddi as from a vb. be-raiðjan*, 'to prepare' (not found in ON, unless in OSwed beraiða, 'to pay'); cf. Kock (a).

16/4 bió til váðar: Amma is making woollen cloth (váð), but it is noticeable that sheep are not mentioned in the poem.

16/5 Sveigr: a head-dress with a curved crown, bending forwards over the forehead (cf. sveigja, 'to bend'). The faldr, the general term for all cloth-swathed head-coverings, might also have a curved crown (cf. krókfaldr; also, it would seem, the high, curving, swaying faldr of Móðir, 29/1). The elegant Guðrún wore a sveigr mikill on the day Bolli was killed, that is, a very tall curved crown (in effect, a krók-faldr; Laxd 168 n. 3). For a delightful range of Icelandic curved head-dresses, high and low, see Íslenzkir þjóðhættir 15, 20–5.

16/6–8 smokkr . . . dvergar: smokkr is hap. leg. in ON; probably borrowed from OE smocc (recorded in glosses for Latin terms for 'undergarment', 'shirt': colobium, camisia, interula). According to Guðmundsson and Kaalund 444, it was low-cut and sleeveless, held up over the shoulders by straps called dvergar (they do not cite their evidence for this description). More recent research on the remnants of women's clothing in Viking Age graves provides a more reliable picture (see Jesch 15, and her references): 'Normally, a woman would wear an outfit consisting of two or three layers. First, a shift or underdress was worn. This could be of linen or wool, had sleeves, and was sometimes pleated and gathered at the neck. The neck opening was usually held together by a small disc brooch. Over the shift, the woman wore a strapped gown, or overdress. This was basically a rectangular piece of material (usually wool) wrapped around the woman's body and reaching to her armpits. Holding the gown up were looped straps over the woman's shoulders which were sewn on at the back and which were joined to smaller loops sewn on to the front by means of the two oval brooches, the pins of which passed through the loops.' If we take smokkr to be the shift, or serkr, the dvergar could refer to the two straps and/or the oval brooches which held up the overdress. Falk 145 and Blindheim 154 are inclined to this view. Dvergar might then be a popular, jocular term, drawing an analogy between the dwarfs who uphold the sky and the devices that upheld the dress. For illustrations see Blindheim 148, Jesch 16.

16/9 Afi: see commentary to 2/9 and Skm 1/6.

Amma: a nursery word not often recorded in ON (cf. Hym 8), but no doubt of ancient origins (cf. AEW s.v.).

On the placing of the names Afi and Amma at the end of the description of them, and not at the beginning (cf. 2/9, 27/5), see Ríg Introd II. B.

16/10 áttu hús: this would seem to be an assertion of ownership over the whole establishment, the holl and its subsidiary buildings. Afi and Amma anticipate in this 'ownership' the activities of their son (who sets himself hús at timbra, 22/5), just as they eat veal (18/7), while he will devote himself to training oxen (22/3). Is this assertion of their 'ownership' intended to distinguish them in this particular from Ái and Edda, who might not, as the ancestors of thralls, be supposed to 'own' their domicile? To press this point could be to break too realistically into the poet's fable. If Ái and Edda did not own their house, who did? We know of no other class in their world but that of Pír. It may, however, be relevant that the name given to the unfree class in Old Irish law was senchleithe, 'old house', for which the origin can only be surmised (Thurneysen (b), 82, relates it to an age-old association of the unfree with the land: 'Der senchleithe ist mit seinem Landstück so verwachsen, dass er mit ihm zugleich verschenkt wird'). Þræll is sonr húss (11/4), son, perhaps, of the oldest house, the earth itself (cf. Vsp 17/4), which Rígr now approaches for the first time? Could the image of the oldest inhabitants of the earth as the ancestors of the unfree class, fixed to their plot of land, be an Irish inheritance in the poet's material? Though I think it irrelevant to the poet's fable, it should perhaps be noted that historically, at different periods and places, the unfree—in their various grades—often had their own homes (cf. Germ xxv: [servus] suam quisque sedem, suos penates regit).

17–20 On the lacunae in the text see Ríg Introd II A.

18/1–4 Dá tók — byggmiplvi: in supplying the missing stanza describing the meal of the second estate I have been most concerned to provide a loaf that alliterated with Amma. last(ar)- and plger- ('ale-yeast'; later attested) seemed the only options. Having supplied the yeast, I ventured to make the loaf 'steep' or well risen (cf. the transferred use of brattr in Brattskeggr, 24/8), baked in an oven, rather than in the ashes of the hearth. If we suppose that Edda's loaf might be of coarse rye, a barley-loaf (cf. Fritzner s.vv. byggheisfr, -mjöl) might be the next stage of refinement before white wheat-bread (31/7). KLNM s.v. Bakning (col. 307) invents a loaf for Amma's household (ett kornbröd i form av en tunn kaka bakat på sten- eller järnhäll, 'a cereal bread shaped in a thin cake, baked on stone or iron hearth'), without noting that no text supports this. As there were baking ovens in Denmark since the Roman Iron Age (KLNM loc. cit. col. 308), and also baking with yeast, the loaf I have attributed to Amma might have been possible. The original text may have included also a drink of ale, the stage of luxury before wine (32/7; cf. Havelok 1729–32: Pymment to drinke and god clare, / Win hwit and red, ful god plentie— / Was þer-inne no page so lite / Pat euere wolde ale bite), but I offer only minimal suggestions, in the hope that a more skilled poet and antiquarian than myself will be moved to provide a better reconstruction.

18/5–8 Taken from 4/5–6 and MS. 4/9–10. See commentary to 4/8.

18/10 rēðz at: MS. rēð at would mean 'he resolved to' (see LP s.v. ráða § 12). On the decision to level 4/10 as a refrain line here and 32/12, see Ríg Introd II A.

21/4 ripti: evidently a finer linen cloth than horr: it is used also for the wedding veil of Karl's bride (23/6), for Móðir's well-fitting sleeves (28/7), and for the courtly bed-linen of Sigurðr and Guðrún (Sigsk 8/8).

21/6 Riðuðu: lit. 'shook tremulously in little movements to and fro', i.e. with unfocused vision. No single word can render well the excellent original here (see Ríg Introd I D. Theme I (iii)).

22/3 Øxn: the second estate was especially associated with the ownership of oxen and with ploughing in Anglo-Saxon and Old Irish records (see Stenton (a), 385; Charles-Edwards 67–71).

22/4 arðr (etymologically related to Lat aratrum), the oldest type of plough in Scandinavia; it cut a narrow furrow, without turning over the soil like the plógr. The first settlers of Iceland used it (cf. Landn 43: lét hann þrælana draga arðrinn), and it continued to be used long after the introduction of the plógr (as Ríg 22 implies). For illustration and discussion see Reallexikon s.v. Ackergeräte 50–2; Glob (with detailed English summary, 109–33).

22/7 karta: rare in ON; probably a loanword from OE, where cræt and crætwæn ('cart-wagon') frequently gloss Lat currus, 'chariot' (see BT s.vv.).

22/8 plóg: a heavier, wheeled, plough, of uncertain origin; probably introduced to the Norsemen in England. The first use of plógr in ON (outside Ríg) is in Þjóðólfr Arnórsson's Sexsteffa (18/3) c. 1065 (Skjald B I. 343; Hkr III. 167).

23/2–3 hanginluklu, / geitakyrtlu: hap. leg., epithets designed for the context. For comparable descriptive formations cf. Grottintanna, Totrughypia. In Nordic graves of the Viking period a housewife is recognized by her bunch of keys; Jesch 25.

23/5 heiter: perhaps an error for hét, since the present tense is rare in the narrative stanzas (cf. 37/6). In 12/3, 13/9, 25/7, the present is clearly correct. As it is conceivable that the poet may have wished to step out of the frame of the past in the statements in 23/5 and 37/6, I have left the MS. form.

23/6 settiz under ripti: there is a double implication here: Snør seats herself on the dais beneath her bridal veil; she has also placed herself under the obligations of a wife. So, too, Erna walks wearing her bridal veil (41/4), and enters upon its obligations. The pre-Christian veiling of the bride is thought to derive from archaic protective practices (cf. AR § 140).

23/7–8 Biuggu — deildu: these lines are suspect, since biuggu appears again in 24/2, and bauga deildu suggests lordly action in a heroic context (cf. 39/7–8). The reciter's, or scribe's, memory may have been influenced by the sequence of ideas in 41/4–5: Gekk hón und líni. / Saman biuggu þau . . . I have not treated 23/7–8 as an interpolation, rather as a patch over lost text.

23/9 Breiddu blæiur: an elegant equivalent of rekkiu gøðu, 11/6 (cf. Oddr 25/7–8: þá er breiddo við / blæio eina, 'when we spread a single bed-covering', i.e. were sleeping together).

Blæja, an old Gmc word (cf. OHG blahun), probably related to Lat floccus, was used in Scandinavia of a rough woven cloth made from coarse linen for household purposes.

24/3 Hétu: I have emended to the pl. (although the sg. would be possible at the head of a list of singular names) because of the parallel with 25/1: Enn hétu svá . . . (cf. 40/8).

24/3–8 Halr — Seggr: the sons' names are drawn from different conventional contexts. Halr (cf. Vsp 50/7, 53/7) and Seggr (cf. Skm 4/2) are old Gmc poetic terms for 'man', and carry a certain antique dignity with them. Drengr in its frequent usage implies a soldierly, brave, forthright man; in skaldic verse commonly used of a king's troops. Snorri gives a full range of meaning for the term in his own day, emphasizing the young bachelor of great social promise (SnE 186–7; cited LP s.v.). Pegn, in ON and OE legal usage, implies a man worthy to be the trusted officer of a lord or king (NGL s.v., BT s.v. þegen iv). Hóldr implies a man of good family, with inherited land: a term borrowed in Anglo-Saxon for 'a class of noblemen intermediate between the thegn and the earldorman' (Stenton (b), 509; Sawyer 42–3). Bóndi is the owner of a farm and household, rich or poor. Búi is the inhabitant of a district, living in his own house, while Smíðr denotes a man with the much-prized skills of metal-working and wood-carving (such as Skalla-Grimr possessed, Egil 78–9, and Gísli, Gísl 28), while Breiðr, Bundinskeggi, and Brattskeggi are identified—in no unfriendly way—by a characteristic of personal appearance. In Norse popular idiom beards often personified men (as in Hallgerðr's taðskegglingar, 'dungbeards', Njál 113; or the unkempt islander, eyjarskeggi, see LP s.v.; or 'Red Beard' Þórr, see Ríg Intro 1. D. Theme I (iv)). Bundinskeggi presumably refers to a tied or plaited beard (not elsewhere noted in ON; and not in Constable), such as medieval German and French clerics and gentlemen are said to have worn, often plaited with gold thread or ribbons, in the many instances cited by Schultz 288. Here the fashion is dated from the 12 c. In the citations the wearers are mainly grey-haired: indicating perhaps that it was an outmoded style. Brattskeggi suggests a long straight-falling beard. Of the sons' names only Boddi has no prose sense; it may be a diminutive of Búi (SG). It occurs once as a personal name, from the 9 c. (cf. Bragi Boddason), and once as a nickname c. 1200 for one of the Birkibeinar (Ívarr boddi).

25/3–6 Snót — Ristill: it is, no doubt, a reflection of the confined role of women in Norse society that only one of the ten names of the daughters of Karl represents a function, that of 'Bride'. The other names are found, more or less frequently, in verse as synonyms (heiti) for 'woman'. The distanced, poetic character of the names conveys the necessary element of respect towards Karl's daughters—legal, dowered brides—while the variety of heiti, so often conveying little individual distinctness in their original contexts, is in Ríg wittily used to suggest a great variety of girls. Snorri (who has known Ríg) gives his own interpretation of nine of the ten names (though the poet, of course, may have understood them differently): víf, brúðr, fljóð, Snorri says, are heiti for married women (yet the unmarried Sigrún is called víf, HH II 14); sprund, svanni are heiti for proud, ostentatious women, he asserts (no context enables us to check this, but sprund, like sprakki, is probably related to a stem meaning 'lively', 'vigorous', cf. AEW s.vv.; while svanni may be related to svinnr, 'wise', 'forceful', cf. AEW s.vv.; Snorri's reading would fit etymology well enough); snót Snorri interprets as a woman witty in words (influenced perhaps, as SG suggest, by adj. snotr, 'wise'; Norw snót, 'brisk vigour', cf. H. Ross s.v., is formally closer); feima Snorri interprets as 'shy, timorous maiden', 'unassertive woman' (cf. ModIcel feiminn, 'shy', not attested in ON; also OE fæmne, 'virgin', 'young bride'); ristill Snorri reads as a woman of imposing, dominant character (skpruglynd), no doubt, I suggest, because ristill is also the term for a ploughshare, and the parallel stems rist-, 'cut', and sker-, skpr-, 'cut', came together in his mind. For the interpretation of rist- as (v)rist, 'instep', see Vigfússon s.v. ristill. I have followed Snorri's lead.

26/1 at þat: cf. 2/1, 14/1 for similar context. I take MS. þaðan to be a reciter's or scribe's error (influenced perhaps by 4/9, 38/1), since it has no point of reference. Rígr's last appearance was in 20.

26/3 sal: it does not seem possible to draw a distinction between salr and holl (14/3) based on any text other than Ríg. I have distinguished the two in translation, but without great confidence in the terms chosen (see commentary to Vsp 4/6).

26/5 Var — hnigin: the door has been lifted down from its fastenings (cf. hnigin er helgrind, 'the gate of Hel is down': Hervqr sees her father's grave-mound opening, Heiðr 16).

26/6 Hringr: for knocking, as well as for pulling open (cf. KLNM s.v. Dørring). Here there is no need to knock, as door and ring have been set to one side.

27/2 strát: strewn with straw to maintain the warmth and dryness of the earthen floor.

27/6 fingrum at leika: the poet seems to imply both a literal and a figurative sense in the phrase: that the couple fondly touch hands as they tinker with arrows or problems of couture, and that, at the same time, they are at the height of merry, idle, felicity together (cf. the proverbial expression at leika við fingr sér, 'to play with one's fingers', 'to be idyllically happy (doing very little)'; see Fritzner s.v. fingr). LP s.v. fingr expresses doubts as to the interpretation of 27/6, perhaps because the poet plays with a double sense.

28/6 hugði at þrumum: Móðir, like Mrs Merdle, the millionaire's wife, 'at home . . . in her nest of crimson and gold', is 'much engaged with the contemplation of her arms (beautiful-formed arms, and the very thing for bracelets)' (Dickens, Little Dorrit, ch. 33). But in Móðir's day only the lowest classes had—like Pír (10/4)—bare arms.

29/1 Keisti fald: keisa vb. is hap. leg. in ON; the nickname keis (in ModIcel 'protuberant paunch'; Blöndal s.v.) occurs in Sturl (a) II. 168, 208 (1256). In Norw dialects keisa vb. and related words are recorded by Aasen, H. Ross, and Torp, always with a sense that implies 'swinging motion', 'curving, bending', 'towering erect on high' (sometimes of proud behaviour). We could read faldr, or take keisti as impersonal, as I have done: the high, swathed frame made the arched head-dress tower up, swaying as the lady moved her head. See commentary to 16/5.

29/2 kinga: a coin- (or nummular) brooch, named from the kengr, 'hook', 'fastening' (hinged pin and catch) by which the coin was attached. For illustration of four such brooches, from late 9 c. to early 11 c., found at Winchester, see Biddle (b) II. 633–5, Plate XLVIII. In Laxd 224 a kinga is found in the grave of the heathen vǫlva whose ghost appeared to Guðrún's granddaughter; the implication is that the kinga was, even in Guðrún's day, an archaic ornament. On kinga as a translation of drachma, see Vigfússon s.v.

29/3–4 On the syntax see commentary to 15/5.

29/3 slæður: a long courtly garment sweeping the ground, with long wide-opening sleeves, fastening down the front with—sometimes golden—buttons, often of silk and gold- or fur-trimmed; worn by men and women (see Egil 213, 274); cf. slæða, 'to trail along the ground', slóði, 'a track, trail', 'dragged load'.

31/2 merkta: I assume the patterning was stitchwork (as, for example, on the Bayeux Tapestry). Merktr is not elsewhere used of decorated cloth.

31/4, 8 hulði biðð . . . hulði dúk: Móðir sets the table with the ease and gaiety of a high-spirited magician. SG distrust the repetition.

31/5–6 Alliteration on the personal pronoun occurs also in 41/1–2: báðu hennar/ok heim óku and 49/3–4: æðra óðal / en ér hafð. I have not therefore attempted to 'regularize' by reading þunnar hleifar to alliterate with preceding þat (cf. 6/1, 20/1, 34/1 for alliteration on þat).

32/1–4 As the text is clearly defective in line 4, and as there is alliterative potential in Fram and fulla in lines 1–2, I have (a) reversed MS. skutla fulla, (b) transferred setti from line 1 to the lacuna in line 4 (cf. setti á biðð, 4/8), and (c) introduced færði into line 1. (a) is adopted in some other editions and some paper MSS. (b) setti is repeated by some editors in line 4. I have not found (c) adopted elsewhere.

32/5 fan[g]: MS. 'fáán' is commonly interpreted (LP s.v.) as a form from hap. leg. adj. fánn, related to -fár, 'coloured', 'stained', 'bright' (see commentary to Skm 23/2). If MS. ok is omitted and fleski is interpreted as neut. pl. 'pieces of pork', we get 'glistening, or multicoloured, streaky, pieces of pork'. I offer a less complex, though not unobjectionable, suggestion, that we read fang, i.e. either 'sea-catch' (cf. the possible reading sæfng, Guð II 43/2) or 'game'; see NGL s.v. fang § 3. As a preferred menu I have translated 'fresh game', but 'fresh-caught fish' might suggest a grander meal of greater variety (cf. Havelok 1725–8: Biform hem com þe beste mete / Þat king or caysir wolde etc: / Kranes, swannes, ueneyusun, / Lax, lampreys, and god sturgun . . .).

32/7 Vín: see commentary to 18/1–4.

32/11–12 On the textual problems of these lines see Ríg Introd II. A.

35/8 sem yrmilingi: the snake was well known to mesmerize and dominate smaller creatures by its gaze; from this fact the mythical basilisk ('little king') no doubt derived its death-dealing eyes (see Bächtold-Stäubli s.v. Auge 683 § 8, 684 § 9; s.v. Basilisk). For natural as well as legendary reasons a hero's menacing eyes might have been likened to a snake's (cf. Fáfnir's ægishiálmr, Fáf 16; Kroesen 51–2). In ON in four instances the eyes of heroes, to whom noble or royal birth is attributed, are associated with the (terrifying) glitter of the (eyes of the) snake: (a) Vkv 17/5–6 (see commentary ad loc.); (b) Sigvatr Þórðarson's funeral ode for Óláfr Haraldsson (c. 1040), Erfidrápa 13 (his enemies dared not look into the king's serpent-glittering—ormfrón—eyes); (c) Ríg 35/7–8; and (d) Ragnars Saga 115 (where the grandson of Sigurðr Fáfnisbani is born with a birthmark that his mother—Sigurðr's daughter—prophetically described: svá mun þykkja sem ormr liggi um auga sveininum, 'it will seem as if a snake were lying round the boy's eye'; he becomes called Sigurðr 'with the snake in the eye' ormr í auga). Sigurðr's Erfidrápa provides the most firmly datable use of the royal snake-eye motif. Ragnars Saga 115 is clearly under the influence of Ríg 35, in that Sigurðr is, like Jarl, a new-born baby when his eyes are noticed, and the elaborate fancy of the snake image actually in the eye appears secondary, when compared with the simple sem yrmilingi. Sigurðr's snake-eyes have no special significance in his Viking career, but they are genealogically valuable, in that he becomes an ancestor of Haraldr Gormsson, King of Denmark, and Haraldr hárfagri, King of Norway (according to the legends; Páttir af Ragnars Sonum 159–63). He is the only Völsung (before Óláfr Haraldsson) whose eyes are associated with the snake. Whether Ríg 35/7–8 relates to a specific Völsung tradition (older than that recorded in Ragnars Saga 115) or to a more general proverbial tradition, remains to be determined (see the valuable discussion of Kroesen; also von See (a), 8 n. 3).

36/2 áfletium: i.e. in the hall of his home; see commentary to 3/4.

36/3 lind . . . skelfa: skelfa is nowhere else used of 'shaking' a shield in combat; it is however used of threatening with sword and spear (see Fritzner s.v. § 1). To shake one's shield at an enemy might also be a mode of challenge and threat (cf. 38/6).

36/4–6 I take the identical interests of Faðir, Jarl, and Jarl's sons (cf. 28/1–3, 43/5), especially in bows and arrows, to be a considered part of the poet's characterization of a conservative aristocracy and in no need of emendation (SG).

36/7 fleinum at fleygia: cf. kólfi fleygði, 47/3. I have emended to dat. pl. because the poet appears to be accelerating Jarl's activities by placing all nouns in the plural from line 6 to line 11.

36/8 frøkkur: etymologically 'Frankish spears'; in ON probably a loanword from OE francas, found only in Ríg and in the compounds (a) hræfrakki ('corpse-spear', see Gísl II n. 4); (b) ryðfrakka, -i used of an ancient rusted sword (Svarfðæla Saga 145) and of rusted peat-cutting implements (Hávarðar Saga 318); (c) Akkerisfrakki, a disguise-name of Óláfr Tryggvason, in a fictional episode, probably meaning

'Anchor's Fluke' (Hallfreðar Saga 152–3). The poetic instances cited from Hallfreðr and from Porkell Skallason by SG are incorrect readings (see Davidson 512; Hkr III. 195). The Franks in the 7 c. were said to favour barbed spears (Agathias II. 2); such spears are found in Frankish and Anglo-Saxon graves, but the term franca is not found in the oldest OE battle-texts (Beowulf, Exodus). For the franca in action, thrown and thrust, see Maldon 77, 140 (and Gordon's note, Maldon p. 48). Frþekkur would probably imply longer and heavier spears (with a metal socket of three feet or more) than fleinar, less adapted to long shots. In Olcel prose usage -frakka, -i appears to survive as a term for any metal implement.

36/10 hundum verpa: a way of training and emboldening young hunting hounds. Neckel (a) argues that verpa here is not literally 'throw', but 'push', 'drive on', 'urge'.

37/2–3 Rígr gangandi: see Ríg Introd II. B.

37/4 rúnar kendi: Rígr's instruction may perhaps be compared with that of Sigrdrífa to Sigurðr, as a young and noble hero's initiation into supernatural wisdom: a motif inherited, it may be, from an archaic tradition that chieftaincy depended upon 'the greater possession of numinous knowledge' (Fleck 43). Clearly that is why, having proved his 'greater possession' of the wisdom of runes, Konr Ungr will become Rígr Konungr (see commentary to 49/1), of higher rank than his father (46). We are not told that Jarl put his runic knowledge to use. There were sigrúnar, 'victory runes', which a warrior might inscribe on his sword to ensure martial success (Sigrdr 6), but with the god's command to speed him Jarl—and the poet—need not pause for such precautions.

37/5 sitt gaf heiti: Rígr establishes the tradition of transmitting the konungsgæfa, 'king's good fortune', when he gives his royal name to Jarl, to be inherited by Konr Ungr (see Perkins 123–6, 189–90). As Perkins notes, the giving by a king of his own name usually takes place when the recipient is newly born, or when the giver is approaching death; so Haraldr hárfagri sprinkles with water his new-born grandson Haraldr Eiríksson and gives him his own name, declaring that he should be king after his father, Hkr I. 147. This is no doubt a fiction of Snorri's, but it underlines the tradition (compare the legend of the naming of the new-born Óláfr Haraldsson after the two Ólafir—Geirstaðaálfr and Tryggvason—who brought their people 'fortune', Flat II. 6–9; AR §§ 132, 138).

37/6 son kveðz eiga: see commentary to 23/5 on the tense of kveðz. Of the many sons begotten by gods on human mothers in Irish tradition, only one, Óengus Macc Óc, seeks out his father and demands to be acknowledged as his son. Since Macc Óc, 'Young Son', resembles the name Konr Ungr, connection between the two young heroes has been suggested; but the tales are very different (see Thurneysen (a), 598–600).

37/7–10 eignaz — byggðer: a double sense lies in these lines: Jarl is exhorted to get possession of plains (a) that are the inherited property (óðal) of others, and (b) that will become the first óðal of his own race (of iarlar). In either case that will be land already occupied (see Ríg Introd II. B).

38 An epitomizing caricature of heroic conquest, in which all the clichés vividly crowd one upon another—the dangerous journey in a dark, alien, and icy landscape, the chivalric challenge on horseback, wielding three weapons at once, and the broad, abstract finale—war awakened, the field red with blood, the slain falling beneath the onslaught of Jarl's blows, as he fights his way to property.

38/2 myrkan við: see commentary to Vkv 1/2; Noreen § 430 n. 3 on myrkan.

38/3 hélugfiöll: cf. hélug (MS. heil-) fiöll, Fáf 26/3, describing the hazardous path of Sigurðr, when he went to slay Fáfnir.

38/9 víg . . . vekia: cf. HH II 7: Hvar hefir þú, hilmir, / hildi vakða, 'Where have you, warrior, awakened war?'; LP s.vv. vekja § 2, víg § 2.

38/10 völl . . . rióða: cf. Glúmr Geirason, Gráfeldardrápa 7: Mælti, mætra hjalta / malm-Óðinn sá, blóði, / þróttar orð, es þorði / þjóðum völl at rjóða, 'The Óðinn of steel of priceless swords—he who dared redden the plain with blood where nations fought—spoke words of power'. The drápa records Haraldr Greycloak's last battle (betrayed by Jarl Hákon; Hkr I. 238).

38/11 val . . . fella: cf. Hárþ 16: Vega vér þar knáttom / ok val fella, 'We did fight there and cut down the slain' (val being proleptic).

38/12 vá til: I take the phrase to mean 'fought his way successfully to the possession of lands' (rather than 'fought in order to possess lands', as LP s.v. vega § 2); cf. Kormakr Ögmundarson, Sigurðardrápa 6: vá Gramr til menja, 'Gramr won treasure by fighting'; also Þórðr Kolbeinsson, Belgskakadrápa 2 for the phrase til lands vegit hafði, and Eiríksdrápa 11 for vá til landa.

39/2 átíán búum: after the grandiloquence of vá til landa in the preceding stanza, 'eighteen estates' may seem meanly practical: an effect no doubt intended by the poet. Eighteen estates would be reckoned a princely patrimony in the bourgeois-heroic world of Oddr, where fifteen estates, together with the Niflung treasure—hliðfarm Grana, 'the burden of Grani's flank'—are offered for Oddrún's hand (21/5–8). The juxtaposition of the priceless ideal hoard and real estate makes Gunnarr's offer for Oddrún come from a wholly different world from that of Angantýr and Hlōðr—where all of Myrkviðr and a third of the Gothic people are flung into the scales (cf. Hlōðskviða 9, 13). The poet of Ríg has his eyes on both of these worlds (cf. Danþr, 49/1).

We may also see in Rígr Jarl's conquest of átíán bú a reflection of the ancient Irish pyramid of territorial power, as Sveinsson, 290, suggests. There, the smallest territorial unit was the túath (etymologically related to ON þjóð, 'people'), a group of kindreds living in a particular area, subject to the same rí. A rí might become lord over several other túatha as well: he was named ruiri 'superior king' if he was over three túatha, rí ruirech 'king of superior kings' if he acquired greater overlordship. Though the greater kingdoms might contend with each other, the process of accumulating túatha appears to have been in principle peaceful, a personal relationship between the over-king and his subordinates based on a ritual of fealty (Binchy 23, 31–3; Kelly 3–4, 17–18). If Hákon was jarl over sixteen jarldoms (Vell 37; Ríg Introd 1. D. Theme III), the system of power under Norse jarlar may have resembled that under the rí ruirech. Jarl may have been behaving in a violent Norse way when he absorbed átíán bú. But that he should be called Ríg as well as Jarl shows a debt to Ireland.

39/3–8 Auð — baug: we return to heroic extravagance, with the lavish giving away of war-won wealth 'to all', with archaic terms for 'treasure', exquisite horses and a generous scattering of rings.

39/5 mǫsma: hap. leg.; presumably 'precious things' of some kind, but no related words have been found.

39/8 hió — baug: bracelets and torques might be severed into pieces to share out to followers. By his single-handed conquests Jarl appears to have acquired such followers. The poet shows us only the highlights of his progress. On Hacksilber see Shetelig and Falk 273.

40/4 Herser: a noble rank of overlordship in Norwegian society, lower than king or earl, traditionally existing at least from the 9 c. (cf. Fritzner s.v. and Vigfússon s.v. for a valuable range of references and comment). In Ágrip Hersir is the personal name of a legendary king (see Ríg Introd 1. D. Theme III; AEW s.v. hersir).

40/5 Mætti hann: here we must suppose that Jarl accompanied the envoys to make sure he approved of their choice (as did the Langobard prince Authari (†590): he visited the Bavarian court in disguise to see if his betrothed was beautiful; Paulus Diaconus 1. 23–4). It is also possible that the line is defective, with its abrupt intrusion of the sg. hann. Or is it an echo from Konr Ungr's lost meeting with Dana?

40/6 miðfingraðri: cf. mæfingr, Hamð 22/3.

40/7 hvítri: implies lucent fairness of skin and hair.

40/8 hét sú Erna: MS. héttu Erna. The choice is between reading hét sú instead of héttu, or Ernu instead of Erna. I have followed the precedent of 23/5 (Snor heiter [? read hét] sú). Erna occurs only here; see AEW s.v.; SG.

41/6–7 sér unðu, / ættir ióku: the phrasing is echoed in Guð II 27/5–8: samir eigi mér, / við son Buðla / ætt at auka / né una lífi, 'it does not befit me to increase my kin with Buðli's son or take joy in life'.

42/1–9 On the general significance of the boys' names see Ríg Introd 1. D. Theme I. Only Jarl's sons are presented in order of birth. Burr, besides being, like Mǫgr, a common poetic term for 'son', was a primordial giant's name, an 'early-born son' (see commentary to Vsp 4/1); no doubt that is why the poet places him first.

Aðal is categorically different from the other names: a neuter noun normally meaning 'innate nature', 'essential character' (cf. Lks 23/8, 24/6). As a prefix, however, aðal- implies 'excellent', 'chief' (perhaps under the influence of well-known Anglo-Saxon royal names, e.g. Aðalsteinn, Aðalráðr; cf. the assumed name, Aðal-Grímr, of Óláfr Tryggvason in Vǫlsa Þáttr).

42/10 Konr, 'scion' of a noble house, of noble blood. Though nowhere else used alone as a personal name, it is the basis of one of the oldest aristocratic names in Norway, Hákon, i.e. 'High-born nobleman'. Jarl Hákon Sigurðarson is extolled as ragna konr, 'noble scion of gods' (Vell 32), with a play upon his name. St Óláfr Haraldsson was called bragna konr, 'noble scion of princes', by his poets (Sigvatr Þórðarson, Hkr II. 318, and Óttarr svarti, Hkr II. 20), the heathen term of esteem for noble birth being allowed even by a king who prohibited other forms of heathen poetic usage.

44/1 ungr as a constant appellation is rare in the strong form (Lind s.v. gives a single instance, Petrus unger, Bergen 1450), though very common in the weak form ungi (usually distinguishing generations of the same name). Konr ungr is eccentrically designed to transform easily into konungr.

44/3–8 ævinrúnar / ok aldrúnar: hap. leg. The terms are virtually tautological, since both ævin- and aldr- can signify 'life, time, without end', and are conventionally paired for emphasis in formal declarations (cf. um aldr ok æfinsdagar, 'for ever and always'; aldrsáttir, -trygðir ok æfinsáttir, -trygðir, 'everlasting terms of truce'; DN v. 533, DN I. 200, Grágás II. 406; cf. also um aldr várn ok æfi, 'for all our days and life'; NGL s.v. æfi). In these two unique compounds the rúnar could represent secret knowledge (invaluable to life), as well as literal spells (cf. Fritzner s.v. rúnar § 3). I suggest that the poet has coined the two compounds to convey Konr Ungr's vaster conception of 'saving' human life than that embodied in the heathen runic lore. Konr Ungr is, of course, familiar with that lore—Meirr kunni hann . . . (44/5)—and the poet's models can be seen: for mǫnnum biarga (44/6) in the valkyrie Sigdrífa's advice to Sigurðr on biargrúnar: how to biarga . . . ok leysa kind frá konom, 'save . . . and deliver childbirths from women', Sigrðr 9/2–3; for eggjar deyfa (44/7) in Háv 148/4–5: eggjar ek deyfi / minna andskota, 'I blunt the blades of my enemies'; and for ægi lægia (44/8) in Háv 154/4–6: vind ek kyrr / vági á / ok svæfik allan sæ, 'I calm the wind upon the wave and put all the sea to sleep' (cf. also Sigrðr 10). It may be relevant to note that ævin- in Christian diction often refers to heavenly eternity (cf. æfinsborg, 'eternal city', æfinsvist, 'everlasting abode'; Fritzner s.v.).

45/1 Klök nam fugla: as von See (a), 8, points out, the counsel of birds determines the destiny of Sigurðr and of Konr Ungr. Sigurðr understood birds' language by magic revelation, when he accidentally tasted dragon's blood and nuthatches klǫkoðo á hrisino (cf. Fáf 32–9); Konr Ungr, however, appears to have applied himself to acquiring the language in scholarly fashion. On traditions of bird-language see Bächtold-Stäubli s.v. Vogelsprache; Lorenz (Preface and ch. 6). Klak, pl. klǫk, 'cluckings', 'twitterings', is only recorded here in ON, but is used in ModIcel (Blöndal s.v.). Klaka vb. occurs in Lks 44/6.

45/2–4 kyrra — lægja: the text here is suspect, since the helpful superhuman arts of Konr Ungr have been adequately noted in 44/5–8. Those arts he 'knew' — kunni — by his innate gifts. He would not 'learn' them (cf. nam 45/1) now. The repetition of ægi lægia (44/8) in the variant form sæva ok svefia (45/3) (cf. Háv 154/6, cited in the commentary to 44/3–8), and the recurrence of lægja in 45/4, suggest that a reciter, or a scribe writing down from memory, was led by remembered links of idea and phrase to fill in haphazardly a forgotten or lost passage in 45.

kyrra elda: in Háv 152 the magic power to save a burning house is claimed. In Ríg the sequence of words 45/1–2 ... fugla, / kyrra ... may have been evoked by the juxtaposition of the same words 47/4: kyrði fugla; 48/4: kyrra fugla.

sorger lægia: in Háv 146 the magic power to help in sorrows is claimed: þér hiálpa mun / við ... sorgom / ok sítom ...

There is no precedent in the text of the poem that can supply the lacuna 45/5–6. The motif of Konr Ungr's fairy-tale strength parallels that of the sturdy physical growth of Præll and Karl (8/1–2, 22/1–2), but he outclasses them like a Havelok or a Grettir or a St Christopher. I do not know what comparable capabilities or exploits to suggest for him in the lacuna.

45/7–8 afl ... átta manna: fabulous heroes, such as Beowulf, had the strength of for example thirty men (Beowulf 379–81). I have not as yet found a specific parallel for the strength of eight (S. Thompson has no parallels of 'eight' to offer). It is conceivable that the MS. here should read xviii, as in 39/2: átján búum, and that a parallel is intended between Jarl's conquests and Konr Ungr's natural strength, but I am not sure of the value of such a parallel.

46/2 rúnar deildi, 'contended for the mastery in runes', 'challenged at runes' (cf. Vafþr 55/7–8: nú ek við Óðinn deildak / mína orðspeki, 'now I have contended with Óðinn as to my wisdom in words'). Rúnar, like orðspeki, would seem to be acc. of respect. I know of no parallel for a contest in literal runes; here rúnar bring with them the implication of all arcane knowledge. In Heiðr 32–44 Óðinn poses riddles for Heiðrekr to answer, to determine a lawsuit in favour of a worshipper. In Hyndl Freyja elicits genealogical knowledge from a giantess to enable her worshipper to win his claim to his inheritance (þödurleifð, 9/7; Fleck 43–4). Konr Ungr wins his royal birthright of name and wisdom without the direct aid of any heathen deity.

46/5–8 Þá þǫlaðiz — kunna: I take these lines to be a statement of an acknowledged, 'legal', bequest by Rígr Jarl to his youngest son—in accordance with the archaic practice of ultimogeniture—not of land or wealth, but of the god's paternal bequest to himself: the right to his name and to his secret of runes. So Konr Ungr—who already 'had knowledge of runes' (44/2)—is given a certificate of right, as it were, to have such knowledge. The poet plays with the two styles of inheritance—primogeniture: Burr varr hinn elzti, and ultimogeniture: Konr var hinn yngsti—to make Konr Ungr the heir to Jarl's divine patrimony, while Burr, no doubt, will inherit the jarldómr. On the very widespread custom of ultimogeniture, see Elton 181–215; Fleck 41, references n. 9. (Fleck mistakenly writes of the expectation that Konr Ungr should 'inherit the throne'. There is no throne to be inherited from Jarl; the throne is got by exogamy.)

47/3–4 kólfi — fugla: the bolt, a short shaft with a blunt end, was commonly used to bring down birds without bloodshed, so that the feathers would not be spoiled and the birds might be revived and tamed, or killed and eaten. The young son of Cuchulainn, seeing a flock of white swans, asks his charioteer if they are 'tame, or just birds'. 'Just birds', says the charioteer. 'Which would be more wonderful, to bring them alive or dead?' the boy asks. 'More wonderful, indeed, to bring them in alive.' The boy brings them down with two stones, but sets them free again (Táin 170). Cuchulainn himself was a passionate bird-hunter: he would even abandon a serious fight to pursue a flock of birds, 'that they might not escape him, but might leave him that evening's meal' (Táin 185–6; cf. 32/6: fugla steikta). Konr Ungr is in good heroic company in his hunting tastes. The Celtic zeal in bird-hunting is noted by Strabo (c. 64 BC–AD 19: IV. ii. 3). The Gallic people, he writes, use particularly for bird-hunting, a wooden instrument, hurled by hand, not thong, which ranges even further than an arrow (see A. Ross, esp. 128–9). The Norsemen also shot the kólfr by bow (see Shetelig and Falk 306).

kyrði, 'made quiet, still, stunned', with a possible transferred sense 'killed' (cf. Egil 204, lausavísa 39: kyrrum kappa errinn jörnum, 'let us quieten this quarrelsome fellow with iron blades'). So, in 47/4 kyrði may have the gentler implication of bringing the birds down without killing them, while in 48/4 the indignant crow implies the crueller sense, of silencing by killing. That to be struck by a bolt might in either case be painful is evident from the bitter complaint of the mother of Landrés (Karlamagnús Saga 142) who, in bird shape, was hit by a bolt from her unwitting son. There would seem to be little connection between this ancient style of bird-hunting and the refinements of 13 c. falconry (richly illustrated in the De Arte Venandi cum Avibus of the Emperor Friedrich II). There is little evidence that kyrra in Ríg (or elsewhere) meant 'to tame, train', as in falconry (cf. 22/3: Öxn nam at temia; 43/3: hesta tpmðu), nor does the interpretation 'to lure by food or by voice', as in modern German kirren (see DH, SG), fit well with kólfi fleygði, 47/3. The argument of von See (d) that reference to falconry in Ríg 47 (my 46) indicates a 13 c. date for Ríg cannot be accepted.

48/1 kráka: in Vǫls 2–3, ch. 1, Óðinn sends a valkyrie (Hildir, 'War') in the shape of a crow with an apple for the infertile queen, who then conceives Vǫlsungr—ancestor of a great heroic and royal line. Is it possible that Konr Ungr's crow has been dispatched with a comparable purpose: to provoke him not only to war, but to find a wife for himself and establish a royal line? The Irish war-goddesses often assume the form of a crow (cf. Táin 178). In Odinic tradition the crow is less prominent as the war-god's associate than the raven (see also von See (a), 9).

48/2 kvisti: Nygaard § 115 accepts this as locative without preposition (cf. the possible parallel in Ghv 16/9; also legal phrases in Grágás: sitja strandsetrum, búsetru, etc.). The crow has, as it were, 'settled' the bough.

48/7 hiþrum bregða: the missing line is supplied by analogy with 38/8 ok hiþrvi brá, and HH I 46/8 hiþrom at bregða.

49/1 Á: on the sg. vb. when a pl. subject follows see Heusler (c), § 445 (b).

Danr ok Danpr: these two names are associated only here and in two genealogies, variant to each other, of the royal Danish house in its early days: (a) in Arngrímur Jónsson, Rerum Danicarum Fragmenta (1596), 336–8, and (b) in Yng 34–5. I would suggest that both of these sources derive the association of the two names (directly or indirectly) from Ríg, and that the poet of Ríg had himself concocted the Viking pair, for the purposes of his poem, out of an already traditional Danish eponym Danr (see below) and the exotic Danpr, lifted from the heroic-legendary staðar Danpar of Hlǫðskviða 9/6 and Akv 5/6 (see commentary ad loc.). I suggest that the poet invented a daughter Dana for (on the extant evidence) Danpr, who would marry Rígr, the archetypal konungr. Arngrímur tells us that Rigus married Dana, daughter of Danpri cujusdam, domini in Danpsted, and that Rigus, having acquired the title of king in sua illa provincia, 'in that province of his'—in other words having taken possession of Danpsted in the name of king—he left an heir, Dan sive Danum, by his wife Dana. When this Danus inherited his father's sovereignty (paternam ditionem), all his subjects were called Dani (subditi omnes Dani dicebantur). Arngrímur's text has two details that correspond to the extant text of Ríg; these details are not in Yng: (a) Rigus is explicitly placed in the estate of noblemen (sc. iarlar): Rigus nomen fuit viro cuidam inter magnates sui temporis non infimo; (b) there is a hint of word-play on the name Rigus and the genitive of rex (Regis titulo . . . acquisito, 'having acquired the title of king'), which recalls the play implicit in Ríg on Konr Ungr and konungr. If this Latin word-play derives from Arngrímur himself (as seems most probable), then Arngrímur must have known the text of the poem, including the ending, which would presumably contain the word konungr. In Yng Snorri is dovetailing the genealogy of Dyggvi (Ytal 7) with that of Rígr. He is concerned, it would seem, to bring together the fact that Rígr was the first to be called king in the Danish—i.e. Norse—tongue (fyrstr var konungr kallaðr á danska tungu, Hkr I. 34), with the fact that Dyggvi, the Ynglingr, is called konungmaðr in Þjóðólfr's poem. Snorri therefore makes Dyggvi the first to be called king in his family (sinna ættmanna). Snorri also makes Dyggvi's mother, Drótt (almost certainly an invention—skáldskapur Snorra—as Guðnason says, 84) a granddaughter of Rígr, as if to suggest that the novel idea of a king's name came to him from Rígr's kin. Snorri omits Dana, places Rígr as father of Danpr, and Danpr as father of Danr (and Drótt):

Snorri has brushed aside the exogamic myth, and the semi-divine stranger prince wooing the land of Denmark. He has placed the eccentric Rígr at the head of the line, so that all the descendants can alliterate, including the incorporated Ynglingar. Though Snorri distorts the genealogy of Ríg for his own concerns, he may be reproducing the text of the poem more closely than Arngrímur when he states explicitly—as Arngrímur does not—that Rígr was the first to be called king, and that in the Danish tongue (i.e. konungr).

What role can Danr, companion of Danpr, have played in Ríg? Was he father, brother, or son of Danpr? Dana might have named her own son after any of those relatives, but if he were her brother, and still alive when she married Rígr, would she be her father's heir? Saxo gives Dan a brother as obviously legendary as Danpr: Angul, and adds that although these two brothers 'gained rule over the territory (of Denmark) by the willing consent of their countrymen . . . they yet lived without the name of king; for in that age no custom sanctioned its common use among our people' (Saxo I. i; History I. 14, cf. II. 25). This plainly reflects the theme of Ríg. One of Saxo's Icelandic informants no doubt retailed the relevant parts of the poem to Saxo. He may have changed a historically useless brother Danpr into Angul.

Did the poet make Danpr, and not Danr, the father of Dana because he wished to steer clear of existing traditions of the eponym Dan in order to create a totally fresh figure, Danr Rígsson, for his poem? The Chronicon Lethrense (c. 1170) makes Dan one of three sons of Ypri of Uppsala, who became ancestors of the Danes, the Norwegians, and the Swedes. Dan was chosen as king and lived at Hleiðra (Lejre) with his wife Dana (SMHD I. 43–5). Arngrímur Jónsson tells of a Danr II 'hinn Mikellati' (the Proud), descended from Danr I, the son of Rigus. Danr II conquered Sjælland and established a mighty kingdom, named after himself. Arngrímur is clearly trying to reconcile two sources very thoughtfully, even suggesting that Danr I's kingdom was Jutland, so that Danr II could start afresh in Sjælland (on Arngrímur's scholarly conscience see Guðnason 10). One of his sources must be Ríg, the other a genealogical tradition of the Danish house with the arrogant eponymous ancestor Dan. This tradition was known to Snorri and probably stood in Skjöldunga Saga (cf. Dan elatus in Sven Aggesen, SMHD I. 106; Dan 'stained with pride' in Saxo IV. vi). Snorri, with a more ruthless scholarly conscience than Arngrímur, simplifies the two Danir into one, with the nickname inn mikilláti. The poet of Ríg, by creating his own legend of two Danir, associated with his invented figure of Rígr, has caused confusion for the later historians, who were still burdened with old traditions of Danr inn mikilláti—traditions which, in oral form, probably gave the poet of Ríg his idea for the ending of his poem in the first place. So convincing is his poem, that he has established himself as a historical source for later centuries without any credentials whatsoever.

49/7 kenna, 'to teach' (the sword's edge), 'to teach (an enemy) to know, experience' (the sword's edge). Kenna is commonly used in battle idiom with cruel and ironic understatement (cf. LP s.v. kenna §§ 1, 3).

VQLUNDARKVIÐA

CONTENTS

TEXT AND TRANSLATION	243
INTRODUCTION	255
I. The Story according to the Poem	255
II. A Comparison of Völundarkviða with its Analogues	258
A. The swan maidens' marriage	258
B. The lonely smith, feared by men	259
C. The prince of elves	261
D. The smith's imprisonment and revenge	263
E. The escape-flight of Völundr	265
1. Mechanical wings created by the master smith	265
2. Magical flight	266
F. The smith as remoulder of skeletons	267
G. The corpse beneath the forge	267
H. The lameness of the smith	268
J. The ring	269
III. The Origins of Völundarkviða	269
A. The legend of Völundr the smith and Niðuðr the king	269
1. Traces and versions of the legend	269
(i) Before 1000	269
(ii) After 1000	272
2. The forms of the legend	274
(i) The great sword Mimring	275
(ii) The making of the wings	275
(iii) Egill shoots at Völundr	276
3. The relationship between Deor and Völundarkviða	276
Appendix: Deor lines 1-13	279
4. Weland as Christian figura	280
B. The swan maiden sequence	285

C. The Lappish connection	287
D. The Icelandic connection	289
IV. The Text of Vqlundarkviða	290
A. Discrepancies	290
B. Lacunae in the text	292
C. Redundancies in the text	293
D. Stanza length, repetition, and verbal play	293
E. Metrical notes	295
Excursus: Vqlundr and Cardillac	296
COMMENTARY ON THE TEXT	301
INDEX OF PERSONAL NAMES	327

VQLUNDARKVIÐA

Frá Vqlundi

Níðuðr hét konungr í Svíðióð. Hann átti tvá sono ok eina dóttur; hón hét Bøðvildr. Bræðr [vóro] þrír, synir Finna konungs. Hét einn Slagfiðr, annarr Egill, þriði Vqlundr. Þeir skriðu ok veiddo dýr. Þeir kvómo í Úlfdali ok gerðu sér þar hús. Þar er vatn er heitir Úlfsiár. Snemma of morgin fundo þeir á vazströndo konor þriár, ok spunno lín. Þar vóro hiá þeim álptarhamir þeira; þat vóro valkyrior. Þar vóro tvær døtr [H]lððvés konungs, Hlaðguðr Svanhvít ok Hervqr Alvitr; en þriðia var Qlrún Kiárs dóttir af Vallande. Þeir hqðo þær heim til skála með sér. Fekk Egill Qlrúnar, en Slagfiðr Svanhvítar, en Vqlund[r] Alvítrar. Þau bioggo siau vetr. Þá flugo þær at vitia víga ok kvómo eigi aptr. Þá skreið Egill at leita Qlrúnar, en Slagfiðr leitaði Svanhvítar, en Vqlundr sat í Úlfdolom. Hann var hagrastr maðr, svá at menn viti, í fornóm sōgom. Níðuðr konungr lét hann hōndom taka, svá sem hér er um kveðit.

Of Vqlundr

There was a king in Sweden called Níðuðr. He had two sons and a daughter; she was called Bøðvildr. There were three brothers, sons of the king of the Lapps. One was called Slagfiðr, another Egill, the third Vqlundr. They travelled on skis and hunted wild beasts. They came to Wofldales and made themselves a house there. There is a lake there called Wolf Lake. In the early morning they found on the lake-shore three women, and they were spinning linen. There lay beside them their swan-garments; they were valkyries. There were two daughters of King Hlððvér, Hlaðguðr Svanhvít and Hervqr Alvitr; the third was Qlrún, daughter of Caesar of Gaul. They took them to their house with them. Egill took Qlrún as his wife, and Slagfiðr Svanhvít, and Vqlundr Alvitr. They lived together

The full text of the poem is only in R; A contains the first six sentences of the prose prologue.
 Frá Vqlundi] Frá Níðaði konungi A. The title Vqlundarkviða is from paper MSS. In the prose prologue capitals mark the beginnings of sentences as printed here; en is also capitalized in en þriðia ... en Slagfiðr ... en Vqlundr (lines 7-9). Hann (line 11) has a marginal capital. Line 1 Níðuðr]
 Níðaðr A; cf. R 41/1 Svíðióð] Svíðióð A tvá] ii. R, A sono] sunu A hón hét] ok hét hón
 A line 2 vóro] so A þrír] iii. R, A Slagfiðr] Slagfinnr A line 3 kvómo] kómu
 A line 4 gerðu] The text of A ends here. þriár] iii. R line 9 siau] .vii. R lines 9, 11 Svanhvítar] Svanhvít^{ar} R for seven winters. Then the wives flew away to seek battles and did not come back. Then Egill sped on skis to seek Ölrún, and Slagfiör sought Svanhvít, and Völundr stayed in Wolfdales. He was the most skilful man known to men in the histories of the past. King Níðuör had him taken prisoner, as it is recounted here.

Frá Völundi ok NíðuöiOf Völundr and Níðuör

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1 Meyiar flugo sunnan
Myrkvið í gøgnom,
alvítr unga[r],
ørlog drýgia.
Þær á sævar strönd
settuz at hvílaz,
drósir suðrænar,
dýrt lín spunno. 2 Ein nam þeira Egil at veria, føgr mæf fira,
faðmi liósom.
Önnur um Slagfinn svanfiaðrar dró,
en in þriðia,
þeira systir,
varði hvítan
háls Völundar. 3 Sáto síðan siau vetr at þat, en inn átta
allan þráðo, en enn níunda
nauör um skilði.
Meyiar fýstoz á myrkvan við,
alvítr unga[r],
ørlog drýgia. | Maidens flew from the south through Mirkwood,
foreign beings, young,
their fate to fulfil.
They by a lake's shore settled to rest themselves, southern damsels, precious linen they spun. One of them took Egil to cherish, lovely maid of the living,
on her shining breast.
The second over Slagfiör drew her swan's wings,
while the third,
sister of these,
enfolded the fair-white neck of Völundr. Stayed then seven winters after that, but all the eighth ached with longing, and in the ninth
need divorced them.
Maidens sped
to murk-dark wood,
foreign beings, young,
their fate to fulfil. |
|--|--|

2/5 um Slagfinn] v^{ar} svan hvít R; see commentary.
3/2, 3, 5 siau ... átta ... níunda] vii. ... viii. ... ix. R

2/10 Völundar] onondar R

- | | |
|--|--|
| 4 Kom þar af veiði
veðreygr skyti.
Slagfiör ok Egill
sali fundo auða, gengo út ok inn
ok um sáz. 5 Austr skreið Egill at Ölrúno, en suör Slagfiör
at Svanhvító, en einn Völundr
sat í Úlfdölom. 6 Hann sló gull rautt við gim fastan, lukði hann alla
lindbauga vel.
Svá beið hann sinnar liós[s]ar kvánar,
ef hánom koma gerði. 7 Þat spyrr Níðuör, Niára dróttinn,
at einn Völundr
sat í Úlfdölom.
Nóttom fóro seg[g]er,
negldar vóro brynior,
skildir bliko þeira
við enn skarða mána. 8 Stigo ór spödom at salar gaffi, gengo inn þaðan
endlangan sal.
Sá þeir á bast
bauga dregna, | Came there from hunting
the storm-watching marksman.
Slagfiör and Egill found rooms empty, walked out and in and gazed about them. East skimmed Egill seeking Ölrún, and southwards Slagfiör seeking Svanhvít,
but alone Völundr stayed in Wolfdales. He beat red gold round the firm-set gem, he closed all
rings well for the linden rope.
So he waited for his radiant wife,
if she should return to him. Níðuör learns of it,
lord of the Niárar,
that Völundr alone stayed in Wolfdales.
At night the men went,
metal-studded were their mail-coats,
their shields glinted in the shrunken moon. Got down from their saddles at the hall gable, strode in from there
down the length of the hall.
They saw on the rope of bast rings threaded, |
|--|--|

4/2 veðr-] vegr- R; cf. 10/2
5/1 skreið] screiþ^r R
6/2 gim fastan] gimfastan R
8/3 gengo] o corrected from e R

4/6 sáz] metrically sáo2
5/3, 5 en] initial capital R
6/5 lióssar] liosár R

5/1 Austr] no initial capital R
6/1 Hann] no initial capital R
7/5 fóro] v^{oro} R (cf. Vsp 26/8)

- siau hundrað allra,
er sá seggr átti.
- 9 Ok þeir af tóko,
ok þeir á léto,
fyr einn útan,
er þeir af léto.
- 10 Kom þar af veiði
veðreygr skyti,
Völundr líðandi
um langan veg.
Gekk brúnni bero [biart] hold steikia.
Ár brann hrísi
allþur[r] fura,
viðr enn vin[d]þurri,
fyr Völundi.
- 11 Sat á berfialli,
bauga talði
—álfa lióði—
eins saknaði.
Hugði hann at hefði
Hloðvér's dóttir
—alvítr unga—
væri hón aptr komin.
- 12 Sat hann svá lengi
at hann sofnaði, ok hann vaknaði
vilialauss.
Vissi sér á hǫndom hǫfgar nauðir, en á fótom
fiqtur um spenntan.
- 13 'Hverir ro iðfrar
þeir er á lögðo
- seven hundred in all,
which that man owned.
- And they took them off,
and they placed them on,
except for one,
which they kept off.
- Came there from hunting
the storm-watching marksman, Völundr ranging on a long road.
Went to roast [bright] flesh
from the brown she-bear.
Quick blazed with the kindling
the sear pine,
wind-dry wood,
before Völundr.
- Sat on the bear-skin, counted rings
—prince of elves—
one he missed.
He thought that she had it, Hloðvér's daughter —foreign being, young—that she had come back.
- He sat so long that he fell asleep, and he awoke
without joy.
Felt on his hands
heavy bonds,
and on his feet
a chain fastened.
- 'Who are these warriors who have placed on

8/7 siau] vii. R 10/1 Kom] no initial capital R 10/5 Gekk] initial capital R
10/5 brúnni] b corrected from v R 10/7 Ár] hár R 10/9 vindþurri] Vín þvri R (cf. 16/4 enlangan)

- þbesti byr símaþ
ok mik bundo?'
- 14 Kallaði nú Níðuðr,
Niára dróttinn:
'Hvar gaztu, Völundr
—vísi álfa!—
vára aura
í Úlfðolom?
Gull var þar eigi á Grana leiðo—fiarri hugða ek vart land fiðlloM Rínar!'
- 15 'Man ek at vér meiri
mæti áttom, er vér heil hiú
heima vórom.
Hlaðguðr ok Hervor—borin var Hloðvé—
kunn var Qlrún, Kíars dóttir.'
- 16 [Úti stendr kunnig
kván Níðaðar.]
Hón inn um gekk
en[d]langan sal,
stóð á gólfi,
stilti rǫddo:
'Era sá nú hýrr,
er ór holti ferr'.
- Níðuðr konungr gaf dóttur sinni Bǫðvildi gull[h]ring þann er hann tók af bastino at Völundar, en hann siálfr bar
- Now Níðuðr called out,
lord of the Niárar:
'Where, Völundr, did you get —you master of elves!—
wealth of ours
in Wölfdales?
There was no gold there on Grani's path—
a long way I thought our land from the hills of the Rhine!'
- 'I remember that we owned a greater treasure when we were a whole family in our home.
Hlaðguðr and Hervor—
she was Hloðvér's child—
Qlrún was famous,
Caesar's daughter.'
- [Outside stands the wise
wife of Níðuðr.]
In she walked down the length of the hall,
stood still on the floor,
kept her voice low:
'He is not well-disposed now, this one who comes from the wood.'
- King Níðuðr gave his daughter Bǫðvildr the gold ring that he took off the rope at Völundr's house, while he

13/3 See commentary. 15/1 Man] no initial capital R 15/3 hiú] metrically hiú
15/5 Hlaðguðr] initial capital R 15/5-8 See Vkv Introd IV. A. 15/6 borin van Hloðvé]
As the text stands, this would seem to refer only to Hervor. 15/8 Kíars] metrically Kíars 16/1-2 Adopted from 30/1-2; see commentary. 16/3 Hón] no initial capital R 16/4 end-langan] enlangan R 16/7-8 Note that stanzas 16 and 17 should be read consecutively, presenting the queen's speech. Prose: Níðuðr (line 1) and en (line 4) have initial capitals.

- sverðit er Völundr átti. En dróttning kvað: himself wore the sword that belonged to Völundr. And the queen said:
- 17 'Tenn hánom teygiaz, er hánom er tét sverð, 'His teeth are tempted when the sword is displayed in his sight, ok hann Þöðvildar and he recognizes baug um þekkir! Þöðvildr's ring!
Ámon ero augo His eyes remind one ormi þeim enom frána. of the glittering serpent.
Sníðið ér hann Cut from him sina magni the strength of his sinews ok setið hann síðan and lodge him then í Sævarstöð.' in Seabeaching.'
- Svá var gort, at skornar vóro sinar í knésfótom, ok settr í hólum einn er þar var fyrir lande, er hét Sævarstaðr. Þar smíðaði hann konungi allz kyns gorsimar. Engi maðr þorði at fara til hans nema konungr einn. Völundr kvað: So it was done: the sinews in the hollows of his knees were cut, and he was placed on an island off the coast there, which was called Seastead. There he fashioned for the king treasures of every kind. No man dared to go to him except only the king. Völundr said:
- 18 'Skinn Níðaði [skyggt] sverð á linda, þat er ek hvesta sem ek hagast kunna, sem ek herðak sem mér hægst þótti. Sá er mér frá[n] mækir æ fiarri borinn— sékka ek þann Völundi til smíðio borinn. Nú berr Þöðvildr brúðar minnar— biðka ek þess bót— bauga rauða.' 'There shines for Níðuðr the [burnished] sword at his belt that I made sharp with all the skill I knew, and I hardened as seemed to me surest. For me that bright blade is borne far away for ever— I do not see it brought to Völundr in his smithy. Now Þöðvildr is wearing— I shall know no redress for this— my bride's red rings.'

17/1 Tenn] marginal capital R 17/2 tét] metrically téit 17/6 enom] corrected from erom R 17/8 sina] metrically sinva? 17/9 setið] settiþ R 17/10 -stöð] corrected from stað R Prose: capitals are used at the beginnings of sentences as printed here; Þar (line 4) has a marginal capital. 18/2 skyggt] see commentary. 18/4 hagast] hagast R 18/7 fránn] frá R

- 19 Sat hann, né hann svaf, ávalt, He sat, he did not sleep, ceaselessly, ok hann sló hamri and he smote with his hammer —vél görði hann heldr —devices he made rather hvatt Níðaði rapidly for Níðuðr.
- 20 Drífo ungir tveir Two boys raced á dýr síá, to gaze on the riches, synir Níðaðar, sons of Níðuðr,
í Sævarstöð. in Seabeaching.
- 21 Kómo þeir til kisto, They came to the coffer,
kröfðo lukla— called for the keys—
opin var illúð, open lay evil,
er þeir í sá. as they looked in.
Fiðlð var þar menia, Stores of trinkets were there,
er þeim mögom sýndiz which, it seemed to the boys, at væri gull rautt were red gold ok gorsimar. and jewels.
- 22 'Komið einir tveir, 'Come alone, just the two of you, komið annars dags— come tomorrow—
ykr læt ek þat gull I will have the gold um gefit verða. given to both of you.
Segiða meyiom Do not tell the maids né salþjóðom, nor men of the household, manne öngom, not a soul,
at it mik fyndið.' that you came to see me.'
- 23 Snemma kallað[i] Early one youth seggr [á] annan, called to the other, bróðir á bróður: brother to brother:
'Göngom baug síá!' 'Let's go and see the rings!'
- 24 Kómo til kisto, Came to the coffer,
kröfðo lukla— called for the keys—
opin var illúð, open lay evil,
er þeir í lito. as they looked in.

19/3 görði] written twice, the second deleted 20/2 síá] metrically séa 21/1 Kómo] no initial capital R 21/4 sá] metrically são 22/1 Komið] no initial capital R 22/5 Segiða] initial capital R 22/5 Segiða meyiom] Segit á meyiö R (i.e. 'Tell the maidens') 23/4 síá] metrically séa

- 25 Sneið af hofuð
 húna þeira
 ok undir fen fiqturs
 fœtr um lagði.
 En þær skálar,
 er und skörom vóro,
 sveip hann útan silfri,
 seldi Níðaði.
 En ór augom
 iarknasteina
 sendi hann kunnigri kono Níðaðar.
 En ór tönnum
 tveggja þeira
 sló hann brióstkringlor,
 sendi Bøðvildi.
- Cut off the heads
 of those young cubs,
 and beneath the mud of the forge-well
 laid their feet.
 But those bowls,
 that were beneath the bobbed hair,
 he enclosed in silver,
 gave them to Níðuðr.
 And from the eyes
 pure gems
 he sent to the wise
 wife of Níðuðr.
 And from the teeth
 of the two of them
 he forged brooches, sent them to Bøðvildr.

[Bøðvildr visits the smithy to mend her ring]

- 26 Þá nam Bøðvildr
 baugi at hrósa,
 er brotit hafði:
 'Þoriga ek at segja,
 nema þér einom'.
- Bøðvildr began then to praise the ring
 which she had broken:
 'I dare not tell it,
 save only to you.'

Vqlundr kvað:

- 27 'Ek bæti svá
 brest á gulli, at feðr þínom
 fegri þikkir, ok mæðr þinni
 miklo betri, ok siálfri þér
 at sama hófi.'
- Vqlundr said:
 'I shall so mend
 the break in the gold that to your father
 it will seem even fairer, and to your mother
 much better, and to yourself
 as fine as before.'

- 28 Bar hann hana bióri,
 þvát hann betr kunni,
 svá at hón í sessi
- He bemused her with beer, for he was more knowing than she,
 so that on the couch

25/1 Sneið] no initial capital R 25/4 lagði] log | þi R 25/9 En] initial capital R
 26/1-3 There is no sign of omission in the MS. See commentary. Before 27 Vqlundr] initial capital R
 28/1 hann] corrected from hon R

- um sofnaði.
 'Nú hefi ek hefnt harma minna—allra né einna
 íviðgirma!
- she fell asleep.
 'Now I have avenged
 my injuries—not one, but all of the envious snares!
- 29 'Vél [á] ek', kvað Vqlundr—
 'Verða ek á fitiom, þeim er mik Níðaðar
 námo rekkar!
 Hlæiandi Vqlundr
 hófz at lopti.
 Grátandi Bøðvildr
 gekk ór eyio, tregði for friðils
 ok fòður reiði.
- 'I have a trick', said Vqlundr—
 'May I be on those webbed feet that Níðuðr's brave men bereft me off!
 Laughing, Vqlundr
 lifted himself to the sky.
 Weeping Bøðvildr
 went from the island, grieved for her lover's going,
 and her father's wrath.
- 30 Úti stendr kunnig
 kván Níðaðar,
 ok hón inn um gekk
 endlangan sal,
 en hann á salgarð
 settiz at hvílaz.
 'Vakir þú, Níðuðr,
 Niára dróttinn?'
- Outside stands the wise
 wife of Níðuðr,
 and in she walked
 down the length of the hall, while he by the hall garden settled to rest himself.
 'Are you awake, Níðuðr,
 lord of the Niárar?'
- 31 'Vaki ek ávalt
 vilialauss.
 Sofna ek minnzt
 sízt mína sono dauða.
 Kell mik í hofuð
 —køld ero mér ráð þín.
 Vilnomk ek þess nú,
 at ek við Vqlund dæma.
- 'I lie awake ceaselessly,
 without joy.
 I sleep not at all since my sons died.
 My head is icy
 —your counsels are cold to me.
 I long now
 To speak with Vqlundr.
- 32 'Seg þú mér þat, Vqlundr
 —vísi álfa!—
 af heilom hvat varð
 húnom mínom?'
- 'Tell me this, Vqlundr,
 —you master of elves!—
 what became of my thriving young cubs?'

28/7 né einna] nema | eina R; see commentary. 28/8 íviðgirma] iviþ giarira R; see commentary. 31/1 Vaki] no initial capital R 31/2-3 vilialauss, sofna ek] vilia ec l'as. sofna.
 ec R 31/5 Kell] initial capital R 32/4 húnom] sonø R

- 33 'Eiða skaltu mér áðr
alla vinna,
at skips borði
ok at skialdar rönd, at mars bægi
ok at mækis egg, at þú kveliat
kván Vqlundr, né brúði minni
at bana verðir—
þótt vér kván e[i]gim,
þá er þér kunnið,
eð[a] ióð eigim
innan hallar.
- 34 'Gakk þú til smiðio,
þeirar er þú gørðir,
þar fiðr þú belgi
blóði stokna:
sneið ek af hofuð
húna þinna,
ok undir fen fiqturs
føetr um lagðak.
- 35 'En þær skálar,
er und skörom vóro,
sveip ek útan silfri,
selða ek Níðaði.
En ór augom
iarnasteina
senda ek kunnigri
kván Níðaðar.
En ór tönnum
tveggja þeira
sló ek brióstkringlor, senda ek Bøðvildi.
- 36 'Nú gengr Bøðvldr
barni aukin,
- 'First you must swear to me every oath,
by the side of the ship
and by the rim of the shield, by the withers of the horse and by the edge of the sword, that you will not torture the wife of Vqlundr nor my bride will you put to death—
though we may have a wife whom you know,
and may have a child within your hall.
- 'Go to the smithy,
the one that you built,
there you will find bellows
spattered with blood:
I cut off the heads of your young cubs
and beneath the mud of the forge-well
I laid their feet.
- 'But those bowls,
that were beneath the bobbed hair,
I enclosed in silver,
I gave them to Níðuðr.
And from the eyes
pure gems
I sent to the wise
wife of Níðuðr.
And from the teeth
of the two of them
I forged brooches,
I sent them to Bøðvldr.
- 'Now Bøðvldr goes with child,

33/13 eða] ep R; see Lindblad 44.
initial capital R

36/1 Nú] no initial capital R

35/4 selða] senda R; see commentary.

35/9 En]

- einga dóttir
ykkor beggia.'
- 37 'Mæltira þú þat mál, er mik meirr tregi,
né ek þik vilia, Vqlundr,
verr um ni[ó]ta.
Erat svá maðr hár,
at þik af hesti taki,

né svá qflugr,
at þik neðan skióti—
þar er þú skollir
við ský uppi!'
- 38 Hlæiandi Vqlundr
hófz at lopti,
en ókátr Níðuðr
sat þá epter.
- 39 'Upp ristu, Þak[k]ráðr, þræll minn inn bezti,
bið þú Bøðvildi,
—meyna bráhvito—ganga—fagrvarið—
við fður ræða.
- 40 'Er þat satt, Bøðvldr, er sgoðo mér:
sátuð it Vqlundr
saman í hólmi?'
- 41 'Satt er þat, Níðaðr, er sagði þér:
sátu vit Vqlundr
saman í hólmi
—eina qgurstund—
æva skyldi!
- the only daughter of you both.'
- 'You will never speak words that could grieve me more, nor, Vqlundr, would I wish you to enjoy a worse fate.
There is no man so tall that he may reach you from horseback, nor so strong that he can shoot you from below—there where you hover against the clouds on high!'
- Laughing Vqlundr
lifted himself to the sky,
while, mirthless, Níðuðr stayed sitting below.
- 'Up, Þakkráðr, rise,
my best of thralls,
ask Bøðvldr
—the girl of the gleaming eyelashes—to go—bright-robed maid—to speak with her father.
- 'Is it true, Bøðvldr,
what they told me:
did you sit, you and Vqlundr,
together on the island?'
- 'It is true, Níðuðr,
what he told you:
Vqlundr and I sat
together on the island
—only the time of the tide's turning—it should never have happened!

37/5 svá maðr hár] s^{va} ʔ hár R; ? read maðr svá hár for the metre from Hlæindi R; marginal capital R

38/1 Hlæiandi] corrected
39/1 Upp] marginal capital R

Ek vætr hánom [vinna] kunnak,
ek vætr hánom
vinna máttak.'

I did not at all know how to prevent him,
I had no power
to prevent him at all.'

41/7 Ek] initial capital R

INTRODUCTION

1. The Story according to the Poem

In Vqlundarkviða two tales, virtually independent of each other as narratives, confront each other like mirrors. Each reflects the same phenomenon: duality in human nature. One tale mirrors this in women, the other in men.

One of the dualities is articulated in the first line of the poem: meyiar flugo Stanza 1
... These are human girls, with the flight of birds. They have come from the south to the north: they have crossed the boundary from their other world, but they are still 'foreign', 'different'—alvítr—to those they now meet. Like human beings, they have a 'fate' to bear, but they appear to act in complicity with it: they have flown from the south in order to fulfil it—flugo sunnan . . . orlog drýgia. When they settle by a lake in repose, they are ladies—drósir—glamorous, emotional southerners, like the radiant alvítr Sigrún—sólbipt, suðræn—whom Helgi chides for her passionate weeping (Helgakviða Hundingsbana II 47, cf. 26). And, against all realistic probability, they seem to have brought their spinning wheel and finest flax with them: they knew they would need bridal veils. By this the poet shows that their anticipation of their 'fate' is an instinct of their physical nature, as girls, and as migratory birds, united by myth in the dual nature of the swan maiden.

They embrace their 'fate' with a wonderful outgoing tenderness. They Stanza 2 themselves draw their chosen husbands to them. We have indeed the impression that the choice was not left to the men.

They stay 'settled'—sáto—seemingly without complaint for seven years. Stanza 3
But then a longing, a dissatisfaction, a restlessness, consumes their minds—práðo. What they sought before has become a bondage—nauðr—that forces them to go. Eagerly they follow their instinctual fate once more—fýstoz—over the boundary forest to their old home. They have never really changed: they return as they were when they came—meyiar . . . alvítr ungar.

These magical wives are still so 'foreign' to them that the men are totally Stanza 4 bewildered by their disappearance: they can have noticed nothing of the melancholy, the restlessness, of that eighth year. Two of the brothers go off Stanza 5 to different ends of the earth to seek their wives, but the third, Vqlundr, thinks more deeply and differently, and stays where he is. How would he find her?—his brothers are only guessing which way they went. And if she wanted to come back, and found him gone, she would be lost without him. Behind his decision to stay waiting alone—einn Vqlundr sat—in what seems the most desolate of places, Wolfdales—the poet leaves us to imagine a complex of feelings working in his mind: on the one hand, hurt pride that makes him obstinate and refuse to go wildly after her; on the other, the impossibility of disbelieving in her love for him. This in its turn leads to a mood of confident vanity, that she, who chose him—varði hvítan/háls Völundar—will certainly come back. His art will lure her. He spends his life—when he is not hunting for his food—making jewels for her. Her return is his constant dream: so much so, indeed, that when the king's men have taken one ring out of the seven hundred on the cord, he is convinced at once that it is she who has taken it, that she has come back. He must think that she is playing a game with him: telling him she is back, but still hiding. (We might indeed be restoring a text closer to that of the poet, if we read for 11/6 ok hylði sik: 'he thought she had [the ring] and was hiding herself—foreign being, young [as she was]—that she had come back'.) When he awakens from his dream to disillusion, it is his turn to feel the bondage—høfgar nauðir—that his wife had felt in her life with him—nauðr um skilði.

Stanzas
6-13

Stanzas
14-15

This ironic mirroring of the two imprisonments is intended by the poet for us to see. It is never seen by Völundr. To him, in his memory—and in his mind as a continuing ideal never destroyed by his wife's desertion—his married life was a domestic idyll, a golden age. When he is teased by the jocular king about his wealth in Wolfdales—'Hvar gaztu ... vára aura / í Úlfþplom?'—he only sees all his treasure as poor compared with the pricelessness of his home when all three brothers and their wives were a 'whole fortunate family'—heil hiú—together.

Stanzas
16-25

The text of the poem gives us no reason to suppose that the brothers had bound their wives to them by any ties other than love. There is no mention of the hiding of swan-garments to prevent their escape,¹ no call of children to hold them back. They were free, to stay or go. Völundr's captivity, by contrast, is deliberately vicious and irreversible—so his royal captors think, for they are not only covetous, but afraid of him. And with reason, because they know his true nature. He has a demon in him. This the poet now reveals. He has shown the human nature of Völundr fully and unmistakably: as lover, and hunter, and roaster of bear-steaks, who will drowse in the fire's warmth and be fettered and maimed—just as he showed that the flying girls could be passionately human. The image of Völundr sitting on his bear-skin by the fire, counting obsessively his seven hundred rings, might have warned us; but the miserly implications of his action are dismissed in our minds because of his overwhelming joy at finding one ring missing. Yet it is at this moment that we are first told of the duality in his nature. He is álfa lióði, 'prince of elves'. The poet epitomizes as ¹ As in most analogues; see Vkv Introd II. A.

'elvish' the demonic nature of the human smith—born in the same nest as the shaman.²

Ironically, the great smiths of legend who so prodigally produce great treasures have also a great vice, that of avarice: an intense possessiveness, an identification of the works of their art as part of themselves. A dwarf will curse with eleven deaths the thieving users of his gold—who have taken his last ring—mun míns fiár / mangi nióta, 'from my wealth not one man shall profit' (Reginsmál 5). In the later legend of Hindemith's Cardillac,³ the master smith murders those who buy his works, and steals them back. So too Völundr sees with hatred the precious things he has made in the hands of his captors—severed for ever from himself. He will murder to avenge them. The queen sees this in him when she orders his sinews to be cut.

Twice the king calls Völundr vísi álfa, 'ruler of elves'. On the first occasion, when he cheerfully greets the captive smith and seems to congratulate him on finding so much gold in a part of his kingdom he could not believe would have it (14), the title vísi álfa seems almost jesting: 'You must be superhuman to have found gold here!' On the second occasion, however, as he grieves for his sons and he sees Völundr flying free above him (32), he seems to acknowledge the truth of the title. Völundr is more than human. Any attempt to imprison the superhuman brings the most savage retribution—as Pentheus also found.⁴ Völundr sends back to the royal family pieces of themselves—the skulls, the eyes, the teeth of their sons—disguised as treasures: had they not taken from him treasures that were pieces of himself?

Once his vengeance is complete, his humanity comes back to him. He showed no cruelty to the ingratiating, childish little princess: he must, indeed, have behaved tenderly with her, as she weeps to see him go. And he exacts oaths for her protection before he answers her father's question: 'What became of my sons?' Though his laughter of vengeance is grim, he does not forget his obligations to his bride and his child. They are the last of his possessions that the king and queen will get.

Thematically the flight of Völundr into freedom mirrors that of his swan maiden wife; he escapes, just as she does, on wings. This mirroring of the two flights underlines the difference between the two stories that have been bound together in the single poem. The escape flight of the swan wife is part of a perpetual cycle—flight, bondage, flight once more. The escape flight of Völundr can never happen again: he will not let himself be caught a second time. Indeed, will he ever return to a forge and his jewels? The poet leaves him laughing in the sky, freed by his art from his art—whose greatest achievement was to give him wings, just like his wife's.

² See Vkv Introd II. F. For the Yakut proverbial saying, 'smiths and shamans come from the same nest', see Eliade (b), 83.

³ This is the closest analogue for the behaviour of Völundr the smith, but perhaps because it is ultimately based on Völundarkviða itself. See Excursus.

⁴ See Euripides, Bacchae.

The poet leaves us to pursue the future of his story with our thoughts. A happy marriage between Völundr and the princess—as in Velents Þáttur—was clearly not his choice for an epilogue. He would have seen—I think—greater harmony with the poem that he had shaped in the epilogue that García Márquez provides: of a very old man with enormous wings—speaking in the 'tongue-twisters of ancient Norwegian', tossed by storm and sea and mud to live in a hen coop among the kindly poor, waiting with infinite patience until the quills on his bare wings grow again and he happily flies off on the sea-wind 'with the precarious flapping of a senile vulture'.⁵ García Márquez could envisage Völundr joining the perpetual cycle of a bird's life, once he had the choice.

Stanzas 39–41 Völundr leaves behind him on the earth Niðuðr and Þoðvildr seared by his vengeance and dazed by their own impotence—ek vætr hánom / vinna máttak.

11. A Comparison of Völundarkviða with its Analogues

A. The swan maidens' marriage

There are ancient and widespread analogues to the story of swan maidens who mate with humans, but, as soon as they can, fly away for ever.⁶

In many tales three or more swan maidens alight by a lake, remove their swan-garments and bathe. A man (usually only one) takes one of the swan-garments and by refusing to return it forces the maiden to marry him, since she cannot now fly away. They live together, and often they have children: the husband has hidden the swan-garment. But one day she finds it, and off she flies. In most tales the husband pursues her, but rarely with success.

In Völundarkviða some of these motifs differ significantly:

1. There is no suggestion in the poem that the swan maidens remove their swan-garments to bathe. The text indicates that they embrace their lovers as swan maidens, enfolding them with their wings (see commentary to 2/5–6): an evocation of a love-scene as dream-like as that of Caer and Óengus. Caer was 'in the form of a bird each day of one year and in human form each day of the following year', and Óengus Macc Óc went to the lakeside of Loch Bél Dracon and called to her. 'She went to him. He cast his arms about her. They slept in the form of two swans, and went round

⁵ Gabriel García Márquez, 'Un señor muy viejo con alas enormes'.

⁶ The analogues are most cogently analysed and documented by Hatto.

the lake three times, so that his promise [that she might return to the water] might not be broken.'⁷ Völundarkviða too begins as an idyll of unforced love, with no shadow of abduction upon it.

2. As no swan-garments are hidden from the three wives, it is not the finding of the swan-garments that enables them to fly away. When they are at peace with their married lives, they do not wish to fly (so the poem suggests). But, as Hatto notes,⁸ the swan maiden story 'rests on the ways of birds of passage between spring (when they fly north to mate and rear their offspring) and autumn (when the urge to fly south comes over them)'. For, in the summer, when they are in moult, they cannot fly, and 'the change of mood when they can is dramatic'.

In Völundarkviða the poet focuses upon this dramatic change of mood. He makes it an emotional reality in a human marital situation. The wives cannot speak of their anguish to their happy husbands; they yield to it mutely in severance and flight. By discarding the distracting symbolism of the swan-garments, the poet has created a prelude to the tale of Völundr's imprisonment that is emotionally equal to it.

3. Only in Völundarkviða, among the versions of the swan maiden tale that I know,⁹ are there three brothers to wed the three swan maidens. This is a pivotal narrative change, which enables the attachment of the swan maiden tale to the smith tale. Since there are now more husbands than one, there can be more than one reaction to the sudden departure of the wives. Two brothers are conventional and immediately pursue their wives. The eccentric third, morose and nostalgic, remains behind, stubbornly waiting for the past to return. Without the image of the two seekers disappearing—east, south—fleeing over the snows in desperate hope, we might not have felt the force of Völundr's decision to stay, the nature of his feelings. It is his memory of his swan wife that forms the link between the idyll of the opening and the savage drama of the close. The pride of the husband that is wounded when the loved wife abandons him, is the pride that avenges itself upon despicable enemies.

B. The lonely smith, feared by men

In an Old English charter of 955 a reference to Welandes smiððe, 'Wayland's Forge', places it in the remote Berkshire Downs, where there are the ruins of a megalithic grave.¹⁰ This suggests ancient traditions of a lonely

⁷ Aislinge Óenguso 43–64, esp. 62–3; trans. K. Jackson 93–7 and Gantz 107–12. In the second citation the Irish text has some uncertainties; I have followed Jackson.

⁸ Hatto 274.

⁹ I do not here count the perfunctory finale of Friedrich von Schwaben which must be a derivative of some version of Vkv (see Vkv Introd III. B).

¹⁰ See Philippson 72–3 for valuable references; Nedoma (a), 42; (b), 133 (with full documentation).

and fearsome place. When Níðuðr wishes to seize Völundr he comes cautiously by night, when the moon is at its lowest brightness, with a strongly armed troop of horsemen. Even with this superior force he does not attack the lone Völundr as he approaches his house—laden, presumably, with the body of a brown bear—but waits until heavy sleep has overcome him and the fetters can be slipped on without resistance. Saxo too describes the elaborate precautions that must be taken before Hotherus can bind and rob the satyrus Mimingus, who lived in a cave in a barely accessible, icy region and possessed the only sword that could kill Balderus and a miraculous bracelet that increased wealth.¹¹ The name Mimingus links this satyrus (a wild man of the woods?) with the smith's name Mímir and the sword Mimring, and I would suppose that Saxo implied that the satyrus was the maker of the treasures. (Saxo may well be indebted to traditions of Völundr in this depiction.)

The art of the smith is a mystery that invests him with menace and awe. He is in command of the supernatural forces of fire and metal: a nature distinct from that of other men. Among some peoples he is respected, a brother of kings, among others hedged in by taboos and hated ('smith' and 'slave' are sometimes synonymous).¹² When Völundr is first introduced in the poem, he has no social setting other than his home with his two brothers. He is not feared or lonely. He creates jewelled rings for love. When his wife and his brothers go, then he is lonely. Then we see him becoming the solitary figure feared and attacked by society. If Völundarkviða had begun with the statement that . . . einn Völundr / sat í Úlfðöllum (5/5–6), like Wayland on the Berkshire Downs, and a curious reader asked 'Why should he be so alone, like an outlaw? What is the background to this situation?', could there be a better answer than the preceding lines of the poem provide (1/1 – 5/4)? He is alone and remote because the life he loved came to an end, and he prefers to live by himself with his memory of it and dream of its return. That is the poet's answer. The only other answer for which I have any evidence would derive from the findings of the social anthropologists to whose work I have briefly alluded in note 12. The poet has turned a deep-rooted tradition of the personal loneliness of the smith's profession to his own imaginative uses.

in nn. 48, 50). The reference to Welandes smiðe is found in Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici v. 322, line 23.

¹¹ Saxo iii. ii. 5–6 (History 70). The 'devastating cold' of the region where Mimingus lived, and the need to travel by reindeer, suggests a context suited also to Völundr, son of the king of the Lapps (Vkv prologue 2; Introd iii. c).

¹² See Eliade (b), esp. chs. 1–10, and n. A, for an illuminating introduction to ancient traditions of the smith; also Cline, esp. ch. 13, 'The social and religious aspects of metalworking'; Forbes, esp. ch. 4, 'The evolution of the smith, his social and sacred status', with bibliography; and Rickard. The wide-ranging study of Motz (d) is rich in suggestion and reference on folk-traditions of the smith.

We have no evidence that any marital drama in the lone smith's earlier life (in Völundarkviða he was married for nearly nine years) was known in Anglo-Saxon England, since both our Old English sources for the story depict only his time of imprisonment (Deor and the Franks Casket).

In contrast to Völundr, Velent has never eschewed the company of men. He thrives in court life and is keen for promotion. In this he resembles Daedalus, the entrepreneur of works of subtlety—the wooden cow, the Labyrinth—for Pasiphaë the queen and great Minos. Velent and Daedalus are geniuses working within society, and prepared to be employed by it: their function is to demonstrate their inventive superiority over other men. Völundr is outside society and works for himself.

c. The prince of elves

Völundr's detachment from human society is accounted for in the poem (a) by his absorption in his past, and (b) by his belonging to a different society, not human, but supernatural. Three times he is called 'lord, or commander, of elves' (11/3, 14/4, 32/2). How are we to understand these phrases? The álfar, revered family spirits, who take their place with the æsir (see commentary to Vqluspá 49/2), do not seem relevant here: how could Völundr be their 'prince'? Völundr's álfar must be spirits who practise the same skills of smith and craftsman, and whom, by his incomparable art, he excels and masters. There are only two pieces of evidence that support this interpretation of álfar in Völundarkviða. In Snorri's telling of the myth of Sif's hair (SnE 122–4), there is a clear reference to álfar as smiths, making magical treasures of gold, iron, and wood: Sif's golden hair that grows to her shorn head; Óðinn's spear that never fails to kill; Freyr's boat that brings its breeze with it and folds like a cloth when not wanted. Völundr's legendary creations rank with these: the translucent gems made from eyes, the sword so sharp and hard that nothing can resist it, the artful wings he can fly with.

The second piece of evidence, if it may be called so, is the historical linguistic identity of Old Norse álfr (Old English ælf) with the Sanskrit name Rbhús.¹³ Three Rbhús brothers ('Eldest', 'Younger', and 'Youngest') had marvellous manual skill; they created the divine equipment of the gods (the steeds of Indra, the chariot of the Ásvins, the 'nectar-giving',

¹³ See Macdonell 131 § 46 for a fine summary of the material on these brothers, sons of the 'Great Archer', AR § 184; AEW s.v. alfr. The etymology of álfr is disputed; the connection with Skr Rbhús being variously rejected or accepted. The coincidence in function between the Norse elves and the Indian Rbhús lends weight to the argument for a common origin of the words; an IE root h₃elbh-* + the suffix -os/-es would yield the Gmc forms behind ON álfr, OE ælf, and the Skr Rbhús could derive from a zero-grade form of this IE root—which moreover could be the basis, with nasal infix, of the Skr rābhate, 'grasps' (< lmbh-* according to S. Mann s.v.) (CT).

'all-stimulating', 'omniform' cow of Brhaspati—an aspect of Brahma. The three Rbhús brothers are frequently invoked to come to sacrifices and drink the soma juice. They follow chiefly Indra, and, after Indra, Tvaṣṭr the smith-god. Because of their incomparable skills they have acquired the rank of gods. They themselves are sun-like: their car bright, their helmets of shining metal; they wear fair necklaces. In Old Norse recorded tradition the álfar have significant resemblances to the Rbhús, in that (a) they make divine equipment for the gods, (b) they have joined the ranks of æsir, (c) they have an important winter sacrifice devoted to them, the álfablót, (d) they are associated with light: Yngvi-Freyr, god of the sun-chariot, was given Álfheimr when he cut his first tooth (Grímnismál 5/4–6); the sun is the elf's wheel, álfrøðull (see commentary to Skírnismál 4/4); in Old English verse Sarah and Judith are both described as ælfscieno/ælfscinu 'shining, lovely, as an elf' (Genesis 1827; Judith 14).

I would suggest that the titles of Völundr, álfa lióði, vísi álfa, relate to an old tradition in which álfar were subtle smiths, before the popularity of the dwarfs as underground metal workers made the elves' title forgotten.

Are we to suppose that Völundr was called 'lord of elves' because he commanded such spirits to aid him in his craft—as a Prospero commands an Ariel? It is more in keeping (I suggest) with the treatment of fantasy in the poem—that of the swan maidens, for example—that he should be identified as an elvish being, an elf man, as his wife is a swan woman. He has the radiant complexion of the elves (cf. hvítan háls, 2/9–10) that betrays his affinities.¹⁴ Belief in 'mixed beings', having a human and a non-human spirit within them, has been, and still is, widespread in many cultures.¹⁵

¹⁴ We may note that in Saxo vi. vi. 4, 9, the smith who is seducing the little princess (no doubt a notion suggested to Saxo by Vkv) is not said to be shining of body: he is clothed in very filthy breeches—sordidissimis femoralibus—and his arms are sweating beneath the gold he wears—auro sudantia brachia; his fingers have been raking the ashes. Völundr is never despised in such terms. Nor are we so invited to watch his approach to the girl (28).

¹⁵ In Óláfs Saga Tryggvasonar ch. 76, Hkr 1. 323, a leading Hálogaland, Eyvindr kinnrifa 'cleft-chin', declares, after torture, that he cannot accept baptism because 'I am a spirit conceived in a human body through the magic of the Lapps, for my father and mother did not manage to have a child before that' ('Ek em einn andi, kviknaðr í mannlíkam með fjölkynngi Finna, en faðir minn ok móðir fengu áðr ekki barn átt'). So Eyvindr dies a heathen; he had been a most skilled magician. Perhaps more widespread than the notion of magical conception as the source of a double spirit—human and non-human—in man, is that of conception through a spirit father: an incubus (such as begot Merlin; cf. Augustine, The City of God xv. xxiii, on the incubi, called dusii by the Gauls, who pestered Gaulish women constantly), or a deity (such as Zeus, begetter of Hercules), or Satan himself, in his many manifestations, who, according to Jewish legend, begot Cain (Ginzburg 1. 105; see also Rig Introd 1. d. Theme II and references there cited). Belief in werewolves also points to the superstition of a double spirit in man (cf. Kveld-Úlfr, Egil 4, and n. 5). For living record of such beliefs from the 1930s, in southern Italy, see the illuminating pages in Levi (1965) 132 ff. (trans. 125 ff.). These beliefs included the gentle conviction that one peasant woman was the daughter of a cow, who had followed her everywhere when she was a child, mooing to her and licking her with a rough tongue. She also had a known human mother, but no one saw any contradiction in this double

Völundr's treasure is then to be accounted for as elves' treasure—such stores of gold as provided Sif's glorious hair? So Níðuðr seems to suggest (14). Were these stores the otherworld riches of Álfheimr and the graves of the immortal dead? Was the fire seen blazing over distant tombs and betraying the buried treasure within them—the fabulous haugaeldr—in fact the glare from the forges of elvish smiths, and the gleam of their molten gold? Was that why the Anglo-Saxons located Welandes smiððe in an old sepulchre?¹⁶

D. The smith's imprisonment and revenge

It is made very clear in Völundarkviða why Níðuðr captures and immures Völundr: he wants his gold, his sword, his rings. And he wants him to make new treasures for him. He is claiming Völundr's gold-hoard as his own (14/3–10).

We are not told that Völundr lived a slave's life—he had beer,¹⁷ and a couch—only that he must not be allowed to escape: so, he is lamed and put on an island with his treasure, and a smithy is built for him (34/1–2). The thought of the treasure lures the king's young sons; the smithy brings the daughter for the mending of her ring; the isolation of the island enables Völundr to murder the boys and rape the girl without discovery. The setting of the plot is neat.

In Velents Páttur the action does not have this tightly woven irony. Velent is lamed because he tried to poison the king, who had exiled him for killing his steward. Velent repents his guilt and promises loyalty to the king, who builds him a smithy and gives all the gold and silver he asks for, to compensate for his laming. Every day Velent sits making treasures for the king. The two young sons visit him, but not to see the treasures. They want Velent to make them arrows for their bows. He refuses, except on one condition, that, when snow has newly fallen, they come to his smithy walking backwards. When they do this, he locks the door, kills them, and hides their bodies in a deep pit under the forge-bellows. When the search for the boys has died down—Velent says they visited him, but left, with their bows and arrows, probably for the forest—he takes their corpses and removes all the flesh. From the skulls he makes two goblets covered with gold and silver; from every bone he makes some utensil for the king's table. He nature and double birth: 'Nessuno trovava, in questa doppia natura e in questa doppia nascita, nessuna contraddizione'.

¹⁶ Over Egill's hidden wealth, cast into deep marshes together with two murdered slaves, haugaeldr was seen to burn, Egil 297–8; cf. also Grettis Saga 57, Heiðr 13, 16. Treasure needs the dead before the fire is seen (so the tale in Egil suggests. See Bächtold-Stäubli s.v. Schatz § 10).

¹⁷ Or at least he might be brought it as a gift (as perhaps depicted on the Franks Casket, cf. Vkv Introd III. A. 1 (i)).

makes nothing that is magical, such as gems out of eyes. When the king's daughter breaks her ring, she first sends her maid with it to the smith. Velent insists that the princess herself come to authorize him. She does so, accompanied by the maid (báðar þær . . . hitta Velent). She enters the smithy (without her maid). Velent locks the door sem fastast and seduces her. No beer is mentioned. He then mends the ring. They both agree to keep this all secret.

The account of the mending of the ring in Velents Þáttir is specially valuable for comparison with Völundarkviða, since the poem is defective at this point. Stanza 25 ends with Völundr sending brooches to the girl—... sendi Bǫðvildi. Stanza 26 begins with Bǫðvildr conversing with Völundr about her broken ring: Þá nam Bǫðvildr / baugi at hrósa . . . The repetition of her name may have caught the eye of the scribe and made him overlook some intervening lines.¹⁸ These must have contained (a) at least a reference to the breaking of the ring, to which 26/4 refers back—the ring er brotit hafði, and (b) some statement that she went to Völundr to have it mended. The breaking of the ring and her decision to visit Völundr—'Out of doors Níðuðr's only daughter was playing, her fine ring broke on a stone. "I shan't tell the maids, or any man—Völundr can quickly mend that break"'—could be swiftly told.¹⁹ It is not necessary to have a maid to say (as in Velents Þáttir 109) 'Velent mun bæta þetta litla hrið', and it would be disproportionate to the remaining structure of Völundarkviða to have two visits to the smithy, as in Velents Þáttir. Her entry could form the first two lines of stanza 26 ('She entered the smithy—Nú kemr konungsdóttir í smiðjuna (Velents Þáttir 110)—and he offered her a seat'). In the extant text the opening Þá nam . . . (26/1) indicates some previous action. If she has been courteously invited to sit (cf. 28/3: í sessi), then she might feel that he was friendly, and flatter and confide in him to persuade him to mend the ring: 'I dare not tell anyone but you'. We may not have lost more than ten lines of the poem in this episode, if the poet has practised his customary economy.

The nonchalance of the princess in Velents Þáttir and the terrified weeping of Bǫðvildr belong to different narrative worlds: the world of Bǫðvildr has the greater subtlety (see commentary to 29/9).

The Old English elegy Deor can hardly be considered as an analogue for the theme of 'the smith's imprisonment and revenge', since the poet has brushed aside the outer circumstances of the story of Weland and Beadohild (though he has clearly known them well). We are not told that Weland was a smith, or that he plotted revenge for his captivity and his severed sinews, nor that 'her brothers' death' was his doing and the child she ¹⁸ It is improbable that there was a prose link here; nowhere in the poem is understanding of events dependent upon prose.

¹⁹ I offer suggestions based on the poet's habit of repetition (cf. Vkv Introd iv. D).

dreads his. For the Old English poet all that matters is the intensity of their wretchedness at this nadir of their lives, and the fact that—despite its intensity—that wretchedness did not last (cf. Völundarkviða Introduction III. A. 3).

Daedalus of Athens has so rich a legendary history in Greek and Latin sources²⁰ that it is difficult to discern any single narrative theme of imprisonment and revenge. He has to flee from Athens because in jealousy he murdered his clever little nephew, who was inventing many useful things—the saw, the compass, the potter's wheel. Daedalus then works creatively in Crete, where Minos keeps him virtually as a prisoner. Longing to see his native land again (according to Ovid), he determines to escape:

'terras licet . . . et undas obstruat: at caelum certe patet; ibimus illac:
omnia possideat, non possidet aera Minos.'

(Metamorphoses VIII. 185–7)

'Though he may block my way by land and sea, the sky is assuredly open. We shall go by that path. All things Minos may possess, but not the air.'

It is then that Daedalus designs his wings.

E. The escape-flight of Völundr

In Völundr's escape two styles of flight are reconciled in the poem. For each style there are distinct analogues.

1. Mechanical wings created by the master smith

Daedalus, when he has decided to escape, sends his thoughts exploring 'unknown arts' and 'creates nature afresh'. He carefully imitates real birds' wings, using feathers, twine, and wax (Ovid, Metamorphoses VIII. 188–95).

Velent proceeds in a similar way, despatching his brother Egill to bring him all the kinds of birds' feathers he can. He makes a winged suit so life-like that it might have been stripped from the body of a vulture or 'that bird they call the ostrich'. He then flies like a bird, using birds' techniques (Velents Þáttir 112–13).

On the Franks Casket, by the side of the scene in the smithy, a male figure is carved catching long-necked birds, most like swans. This could represent Egill gathering feathers for his brother's wings (see Völundarkviða Introduction III. A). But there is no mention of feather-gathering in Völundarkviða. We are not even told that Völundr made wings. We are told he made vél, 'devices' (19/3), among which wings may well have been included, and to which allusion may be made in the difficult lines 29/1–2 (see commentary ad loc.). It is never expressly said in the poem that Völundr had wings, or that he was like a bird (cf. Velents Þáttr 113: 'Ertu nú fugl, Velent?'), or indeed that he 'flew' (cf. höfz at lopti, 29/6, 38/2; skollir/við skj uppi, 37/9–10). His wings are left to our imagination and knowledge of tradition.

²⁰ See Der kleine Pauly s.v. Daedalos. On the suggestion that Weland's legend is derived from that of Daedalus, see de Vries (d), 186–7.

2. Magical flight

Because of the ironic and allusive manner in which Völundr—and the poet—treat the physical phenomenon of his flight, I have related it stylistically to the world of magicians' fictions (see commentary to 29/1–4). But behind the magician's flight, behind Völundr's flight, lie archaic analogues of shamanic doctrine and legend. The magician's is a derivative, pseudo-shamanic profession, practised in the style of Simon magus in societies not—or no longer—shamanic. The Norsemen, however, could know shamanic legends and practices from the living shamanic society of their close neighbours, the Lapps, whose hospitality they had enjoyed for centuries in the course of their trading and tax-collecting. They heard the tales of shamans' spirit journeys, of sorcerers who travelled in whirlwinds, and had been present at their séances;²¹ they had perhaps seen the wizard-like shamans of more distant regions in their costumes hung with birds' feathers and metal pieces. Their bird costumes were symbols, the flight of the shaman's free-soul was the reality. By rejecting all 'costume' detail for Völundr in his escape the poet presents his mechanical achievement as—what it also is—a spirit flight:

Seg þú mér þat, Völundr
—vísi álfa!— . . . (32/1–2)

Níðuðr, when he gazes up at Völundr, does not see an imitation bird (as in Velents Þáttr 113), but a powerful spirit, a prince of darkness.

²¹ The most detailed, scholarly, and up-to-date account of Norse–Lappish relations is that of Clive Tolley, A Comparative Study of some Germanic and Finnic Myths. For the purposes of this note, ch. 2 'Norse and Finnish–Lappish Contacts' and ch. 5 'Shamanism' (now being prepared for publication) are invaluable. Judging by the archaeological and linguistic evidence, the contacts between the Gmc peoples of Scandinavia and the Finns and Lapps go far back to prehistoric times, being virtually continuous from c. 2000 BC. Documentary evidence confirms that the Lapps lived close to Gmc peoples from at least the 1 c. AD; that they 'paid taxes in furs to the Norwegians at least from the ninth century: i.e. they were to some extent a subject and tyrannized people'; that they 'were associated strongly with sorcery'. Indeed, the account of a shamanic séance at which Norwegian merchants were present, in the 12 c., recorded in the Historia Norvegiae, 'indicates that quite detailed knowledge of actual Lappish shamanism existed among the Norse, from which the more fictional types of magic associated with them in literary sources are likely to be in part derived' (Tolley (a), 70–2; for sorcerers in whirlwinds 476; for bird costume 454; see also 533–57 and his separate studies (b) and (d); also Eliade (a) 415–19, for documentation from other sources; on the metal symbols on a shaman's costume see also Czaplicka 211–13).

If the Lappish relationships of Völundarkviða were not evident in other respects, the suggestion that Völundr's flight bore any resemblance to shaman flight might not be thought worth considering. But once the connection is recognized (see Völundarkviða Introduction III. c), we may wonder if the characterization—perhaps already present in Old English tradition—of the Germanic hero Weland as, in part, a superhuman being—an álfa lióði—was not deliberately developed and emphasized—vísi álfa . . . vísi álfa—by the Norse poet so that he could, in perfect sequence, present the climax of Völundr's flight as, virtually, a spirit flight. Like the shaman, he is transformed—not simply fitted with wings whose wax will melt in the sun.

F. The smith as remoulder of skeletons

The making of drinking bowls from skulls of enemies is by no means unique to Völundr (see commentary to 25/5). The making of brooches out of human teeth is not unrealistic (though I have not found instances of it). The making of jewels out of eyes, however, must be a fantasy. While the interchangeability of eyes and jewels in human imaginings is a well-documented fantasy,²² the manufacture of jewels from eyes is (I think) not. This complete re forging of the boys' heads recalls the shamanic tradition that a shaman novice is—in his initiatory dream or trance—taken bodily to pieces by a superhuman smith and re forged piece by piece: this is why some shamans hang iron bones as symbols on their dress. The head is given particular attention in initiation, that of the best shamans being forged on a special anvil. One testimony tells that the blacksmith 'changed the novice's eyes', so that he would see with mystical vision.²³ Once one has read these shamanic doctrinal visions it is impossible to dissociate Völundr's re forging of the heads from them. The Norse poet appears to have used the shamanic spiritual metaphor as a gruesome realism in his master smith's revenge.

It is from such visionary accounts of shamanic initiation that the close link between smith and shaman becomes clear.

G. The corpse beneath the forge

Behind the motif of the burying of the boys' bodies beneath the forge there may lie an archaic practice. Associated with the cult of metalworking is the sacrifice to the forge. In some legends it is the first smith himself who ²² John Ridd says that Lorna Doone's eyes are brown diamonds (Blackmore, Lorna Doone ch. 43); see also Shakespeare, The Tempest 1. ii (Ariel sings of the drowned king that 'Those are pearls that were his eyes'), and Richard III, 1. iv. 29–33.

²³ See Tolley (a), 424–6; Siikala 175–83, 184; Eliade (b), 86–7.

is cast into the forge. In early times Japanese metalworkers set up a corpse beside the forge and many Japanese legends tell of the burying of a corpse under the hearth of a smith. It was an African custom to bury a foetus beneath the forge. Such traditions are considered to be related to the notion that metal is a creature born in the earth and that if bodies, symbolizing the sources of ore, are placed under the smith's forge, riches will grow from them.²⁴ The story-motif of the burying of the boys' bodies 'under the mud of the forge-well' could be a legacy of legend from remote metalworking traditions once valid in Germanic, as well as Oriental and African, societies. Remarkable riches did in fact 'grow' from their corpses.

H. The lameness of the smith

The Greek smith-god Hephaestus is lame from birth. Daedalus is not lame: imprisonment alone makes him determined to fly. This could also be a sufficient motive for Völundr, but it has not seemed sufficient to the creators of his story, they have made him lamed as well. They have done so, probably, not only to make his bitterness more acute and his revenge more savagely physical, but because old folk-tradition associated smiths with a physical deformity. The dwarfs of Germanic tradition, who forge inside the mountain, are stunted. The Cyclopes are one-eyed. Archaic origins are proposed for the deformities of legendary smiths,²⁵ but none are immediately relevant to Völundr's case. Though tradition may have determined the fact that he was to be lame, the realistic manner of the laming, and the reasons for it, present a situation of simple slavery,²⁶ when the slave-owner

²⁴ See Eliade (b) ch. 6, 'Sacrifices humains aux fourneaux', 68–74; Matsumoto 149–57.

²⁵ The smith's disablement in myth may relate to the practice of initiatory mutilation in the closed societies of ancient metalworkers, the sacrifice of one power being thought to increase the strength of the other (cf. Eliade (b), 108; de Vries (d), 182–3).

²⁶ Cruelty to slave-smiths provides the moral of the tale of Queen Giso of the Rugii settled on the Danube in the 5 c., in the days of St Severinus. This woman feralis et noxia had Romans abducted over the Danube to serve as slaves; observing this the saint begged her to send them back. Raging she replied: 'Pray for yourself, servant of God, skulking in your little cell: let us arrange for our slaves as we wish'. The saint quietly tells her that he is confident that Christ will make her do of necessity what in her wickedness she refuses to do voluntarily. Now Giso had confined 'certain barbarian [i.e. heathen Germanic] goldsmiths in strict imprisonment, to make regal ornaments. On the very day that the queen had shown contempt for the servant of God, the king's son Fredericus, still very young, came in to the goldsmiths, on the spur of some childish purpose. The goldsmiths then placed a sword at the child's breast, saying that if anyone tried to enter there among them without the security of an oath, they would pierce first the royal child, then kill themselves, for they could give themselves no promise of hope, crushed as they were by endless days of labour.' When the queen hears of this, she tears her garments in grief—'For my contempt will you bring punishment on the fruit of my womb?'—and immediately sends back the captured Romans and gives freedom to the enslaved goldsmiths, once they have surrendered the child and received baptism. While this tale can hardly be a source for the Weland story, some early versions of that Gmc story might have been adapted for St Severinus—with the ruthless queen and the little inquisitive prince. The juxtaposition of the queen's despising of the saint and the impulse that could lame his smith to bind him to his service—as Samson was blinded to work at the mill and as in later days a plantation owner might chain his African cook to the fireplace.

J. The ring

The ring Völundr designed for his swan wife has significance both for him and for the poem. It associates the two wearers for him and for us. He takes Þǫðvildr much as Kjartan takes Hrefna—faute de mieux. Völundr sees the girl, harmless and a little flirtatious, with the glorious ring meant for his wife; Kjartan sees young Hrefna, also a little flirtatious, wearing the glorious head-dress meant for his wife: 'It suits you well, Hrefna. I suppose it will be best if I have the girl as well as the head-dress'.²⁷ The scene in Laxdæla Saga illuminates the realism of the scene in Völundarkviða. The ring and the head-dress have a comparable catalytic function (see also commentary to 29/9).

There is no evidence that the ring had any magical function affecting the course of the story (such as giving Völundr the power to fly).²⁸ Yet it is possible that the poet would expect his audience to understand that in making the special ring for his wife Völundr was making a magical device to draw her to him and make her stay. In Lappish rites rings were used to assert control over wild creatures (the bear, the eagle), to summon spirits to learn their will, or to stop the dead in their graves from wandering.²⁹ That Völundr should use such entrapping magic would be a measure of his despair, and increase the irony of his own later imprisonment.

III. The Origins of Völundarkviða

A. The legend of Völundr the smith and Niðuðr the king

1. Traces and versions of the legend

(i) Before 1000

The names of the three main characters in the poem, Völundr, Niðuðr, Þǫðvildr, are not found as personal names in Old Norse or Old English historical records. In German records, however, all three are found:

drives the boy to visit the smiths is particularly neat, and suggests adaptation (see Eugippius 11–12; Nedoma (a), 134–6 does not sufficiently consider the fact that the story would only be used for a few relevant features). It may be worth noting that the same pattern of the gentler king with a cruel queen is found in both Eugippius and Vkv (see Vkv Introd III. D).

²⁷ Laxd 133, ch. 44. I have paraphrased slightly in my rendering.

²⁸ See DH, SG, Hauck § 3.

²⁹ See Tolley (a), 454–5, § 3.

Weland and Baduhilt from the seventh century, Nidhad from the eighth. This points to a German version of the story at this period.³⁰

The earliest testimony to the content of the legend does not come from Germany, but from Anglo-Saxon England, in the carvings on two panels of the whalebone casket from Northumbria, the Franks Casket, usually dated to the early decades of the eighth century.³¹ On the front panel Weland is depicted in his smithy; a bent leg may signify his lameness; under his forge lies a headless body. In one hand he holds an object resembling a narrow cup, which is probably better identified as a signet-style ring seen in profile.³² In the other hand he holds tongs which grip a (boy's) head. A woman—Beadohild—holds out her hand to him—it is empty—signifying that she has given him the ring. Behind her stands a woman carrying a flask in a basket: presumably the maid, with a gift of beer for the smith. To the right of this woman, in a separate scene, a man is grasping the long necks of large aquatic birds.³³ All of these details can be identified as relating to incidents in one or other version of the story. On the top panel of the Casket is a vivid scene of armed men attacking a bowman at the entrance to a house in which a woman is sitting. Above the bowman ægili is carved in runes. It would seem to record an incident in the career of the brother of Weland, Egill in Old Norse tradition, which is not elsewhere recorded.³⁴

The Weland scene is the only scene carved on the Casket which has no inscription identifying it or its hero. It must have been better known than that of the Magi, who are identified.

From Germany, in the Latin Germanic epic Waltharius (probably early ninth century)³⁵ we have reference to a fine coat of mail of Weland's making, Wielandia fabrica, that shields Waltharius from the piercing points of his attackers (line 965).

From Anglo-Saxon England, in poetic sources that may reasonably be ³⁰ See Index of Personal Names. The fact that the names Niðuðr and Viðga are found outside the Vplundr story only in Jordanes, Getica (Nidada as great-grandfather of King Geberichus of the Goths, p. 87; Vidigoia as most famous warrior of the Goths, renowned by their poets, treacherously killed by the Sarmatians, pp. 64, 104), suggests that the Vplundr story may be of Gothic origin (see AL § 31, de Vries (d), 187–8).

³¹ Webster 30; Nedoma (a), 5.

³² See the frontispiece plate. The suggestion that Weland and Titus on the Franks Casket are holding in their fingers signet rings of symbolic significance (seen in profile; Hauck §§ 2, 3) seems convincing; see Vkv Introd III. A. 4).

³³ He is, I suggest, gathering birds he has stunned, or perhaps killed (though that would not be necessary if he only wanted their plumes), with his bolts (see commentary to Ríg 47/3–4). I would certainly identify the bird-gatherer as Egill (see Vkv Introd III. A. 2), because of his proximity to Weland in the carving, and the symbolic significance of Weland's escape-flight in the Christian context (see Vkv Introd III. A. 4).

³⁴ See Bugge (b) for a stimulating attempt to interpret this scene; also Vkv Introd IV. A.

³⁵ On the problem of dating see P. Dronke (d), Appendix: 'The date and provenance of "Waltharius"'.

dated before 900, come other allusions to Weland: (a) to his marvellous works, namely, Beowulf's coat of mail (Welandes geweorc in Beowulf 455) and Waldere's sword Mimming (Welandes worc in Waldere I. 2),³⁶ and (b) to the legend of his imprisonment and revenge, with references to Niðhad and Widia, Niðhādes mæg, / Welandes bearn (see Deor I–13, Waldere II. 3–10).

Most remarkably, King Alfred (†899), without any evident reason, introduced lines upon 'the wise Weland' and the skill of the craftsman that can never be taken from him, into both his prose and—more fully—into his verse rendering of Metrum VII of Liber II of Boethius, De Consolatione Philosophiae. The verse rendering indeed suggests that Alfred had phrasing of Deor in mind (see Vplundarkviða Introduction III. A. 3, 4).

The last reference to Weland in OE written sources before 1000 is in the Berkshire place-name Welandes smiððe (dated 955; see Vplundarkviða Introduction II. B). Yet from the north of England in the tenth century there are two carved stone crosses (as well as lesser carved fragments) which may well portray Weland in flight, with wings and bird's tail elaborately bound to him. Below his feet (on the best preserved carving) smith's implements are discernible. These northern carvings add a motif not found in any extant written story of Weland. As he flies, the bird-man holds in front of him a woman outstretched, with her back to him, as if she were being pushed through the air. In the clearest carving he is grasping her hair with one hand and the train of her dress with the other.³⁷ This motif—if the female figure is the raped girl—contradicts Vplundarkviða and Deor: in these poems she has clearly not flown away with Vplundr/Weland. A comparable happy ending is, however, found in Velents Þátr: Velent, when he escapes, flies back to his patrimony in Sjælland; he returns later to wed the princess and bring her and her son home to Sjælland by normal means. Either all this has been simplified—for sculptural reasons, perhaps—into a single dramatic abduction by air, or the author of Velents Þátr (or his source) has introduced a more rational and humdrum journey for the princess than the original air-lift.

In Scandinavia, on the stone monument Ardre VIII in Gotland, the same motif of a woman propelled by a bird figure is found. There is here no indication that the bird figure is also human (unless the protuberances at either side of the bird-head represent folded arms which support the woman), but behind the bird figure is the clear depiction of a smithy with tongs and hammers and two headless male bodies under the floor, which undoubtedly identifies the escaping bird figure as Weland. If the accepted dating of Ardre VIII to the 'middle or later half of the eighth century' is ³⁶ The arguments noted in Schwab 235, 240–1 against identifying Mimming and Welandes worc in this fragmentary text do not take account of the norms of OE poetic idiom.

³⁷ See Lang 89–94; also Nedoma (a), 32–4.

correct, then the motif of the girl rescued by air in the Weland legend could be as old as the Franks Casket, and certainly older than the tenth century carvings of the motif in northern England. The motif could have come to Gotland with other elements of Anglo-Saxon artistic influence in the eighth century.³⁸

From tenth century Scandinavia there is evidence in the skaldic poets that the legends of Völundr's imprisonment and his brother Egill's bowmanship were well enough known for casual allusion. Niðuðr must have had notoriety as a villain, since Þjóðólfr of Hvin, in Haustlǫng 9, calls Þjazi, the covetous giant enemy of the gods, a 'Niðuðr among Stone Giants'—Grjót-Niðuðr—evidently the last word in insults to Þjazi. The source for his kenning can only have been the legend of Völundr.

Þjóðólfr is listed in Skáldatal as a poet of Haraldr hárfagri (c. 848–931); his Ynglingatal was composed for Haraldr's cousin, Rǫgnvaldr. His Haustlǫng may be dated c. 900, in Norway. Some seventy years later, Eyvindr skáldaspillir, in the famine in Hálogaland under the Eiríkssons, sees the depth of his destitution epitomized in the fact that he had to sell his arrows to buy herrings—and he thinks of Egill, Völundr's brother, who also—in a different way—owed his life to his arrows:

Mest selda ek mínar	Above all I gave my own—
við mævrum sævar . . .	in exchange for the sea's slim arrows— . . .
hlaupsíldr Egils gaupna.	leaping herrings of Egill's hand-hollows.³⁹

Some years later the Icelander Hallfreðr vandræðaskáld, composing in Norway for Jarl Hákon Sigurðarson, makes Egill's arrows part of a magnificent rhetorical image of stubborn hostility:

Ólútt brestr úti . . .	With no little crash sounds out at sea . . .
hart á Hamðis skyrturnum	fierce against Hamðir's shirts,
hryngráp Egils vápna.	the falling hail of Egill's weapons.

(Hákonardrápa 2)

Both allusions, to Hamðir and to Egill, show a precise use of their legends. Arrows that never miss their mark pour down on coats of mail that nothing can pierce.

(ii) Traces and versions of the legend after 1000

In the collection of rambling pseudo-historical, pseudo-heroic adventures of kings and warriors that constitutes Þiðreks Saga, there is the vivid, close-knit and remarkably urbane ævisaga of Velent. His father was ³⁸ See Lindqvist: for illustration, I. Fig. 139, 140; for analysis, with drawing, II. 22–4; for dating, I. 121; for Anglo-Saxon influence, I. 120. Also Nedoma (a), 27–31.

³⁹ Hkr I. 223–4, Skjald B I. 65.

Vaði, a giant in size, whose mother was a mermaid, encountered by Vaði's father, Vilkina, in a forest. Vilkina gave Vaði Sjølland as his inheritance. Vaði had a son Velent whom he apprenticed first to the smith Mímir (where he was insufferably bullied by young Sigurðr—later the dragon-slayer), then to two dwarfs in a mountain called Kallava. Velent is a brilliant pupil. When Vaði fails to come to take back his son—having been overwhelmed by a landslide—the dwarfs mean to take Velent's life and possessions. It is Velent who kills them, however, with a sword that Vaði left hidden for him in case of such emergencies, and Velent takes the dwarfs' tools and treasures, loads them on a horse, and travels north to Denmark. He encounters a wide river, and achieves his first masterpiece of craftsmanship: hollows out a huge tree, packs in his tools, treasure, food and drink, and finally locks himself in, watertightly, having fitted a window. The tree-trunk drifts out to sea and is discovered on the coast of Jutland by Niðungr's fishermen. When the king sees that Velent is not a monster but a good-looking man, he is gracious to him and grants him his freedom and his property. This Velent tries to hide secretly in the earth, but is seen by a knight (riddari) called Reginn. With the bad omen of this name, the plots of the courtiers against Velent begin. His murderous retaliations bring first his exile, then the severing of his sinews and confinement to the smithy. The killing of the king's sons follows, and the seduction of the princess, who becomes his willing lover. After his escape-flight home to Sjølland, Velent soon hears that King Niðungr has died and that the princess has given birth to a son, Viðga. Velent makes peace with the kindly new king, the princess's third brother, and takes his family to Sjølland.

In the prologue of Þiðreks Saga (p. 4) the compilation of tales is said to have been made by Norsemen from the narration of German men (eftir sögu þýskra manna), and from poems (kvæðum) designed for the entertainment of the nobility and recited flawlessly in every town in Saxony. Þiðreks Saga is therefore thought to have been written by a Norwegian in Norway, where trading links with Germany were strong.⁴⁰ Certainly the earliest extant text, in a defective vellum MS. from the second half of the thirteenth century, was organized by two Norwegian editors (from a single exemplar). Of the five scribes, three Norwegian and two Icelandic, the third Norwegian scribe shares certain better readings with the later Icelandic version of the saga, preserved in paper MSS. written in Iceland in the seventeenth century.⁴¹ This would suggest that an Icelandic text of Þiðreks Saga was available in Norway in the thirteenth century. Whether in Norway or Iceland, the saga cannot have been written later than c. 1250, since some ⁴⁰ See the discussion of German literary links with Atlamál in PE I. 109–11.

⁴¹ See the incisive analysis of the state of scholarship on the saga and its texts by Tómasson (a), 369–73.

Icelandic thirteenth century writers have used it. Velents Þáttr itself bears no identifiable traces of German literary origins; rather it shares the stylistic ease and undercurrent of witty burlesque of the finest fornaldar-sögur.

Velents Þáttr incorporates some ancient Germanic material that may be drawn ultimately from England rather than from Germany. Velent's father, Vaði the giant, is the Wada of Widsið 22: Wada [wēold] Hælsingum. Legends of Wade the gigantic hero are alluded to in many medieval English sources, but rarely in German.⁴² Again, only the Franks Casket and Velents Þáttr offer detailed scenes (though not entirely the same scenes) from the adventures of Velent's brother Egill. Has the author of Velents Þáttr known Völundarkviða? If he has, then other versions of the story have influenced him more: he has no cruel queen, no weeping princess. One echo of the wording of the poem, however, may be audible in the Þáttr, perhaps too commonplace to mention. When the princess breaks her ring in the garden, þorir hún eigi at segja sínum feðr eða mæðr (109). In the poem Þǫðvildr confides to Völundr: 'Þoriga ek at segja, / nema þér einom'. And he replies that he will mend the gold so that 'feðr þínom / segri þikkir, / ok mæðr þinni / miklo betri' (26/5–6, 27/3–6). The childish simplicity of phrase is strikingly similar (but could be fortuitous). However, on the possibility that Völundarkviða was known to the author of the Þáttr, I have based the emendation of 18/2, borrowing skyggt from the prose text to rescue the alliteration of the line. In any case, Velents Þáttr throws more light on the development of Völundarkviða than the poem does on that of the Þáttr (see Völundarkviða Introduction III. A. 2).

2. The forms of the legend

The extant versions of the legend show that we must reckon with at least two forms of legendary tradition of Völundr the smith, (a) the narrative drama of his imprisonment and revenge, developed with its own independent structure, and (b) the separate anecdotes of the skills of Wayland and his brother, elaborated—like those of Daedalus—within the frame of a court and a patron king. Verse might be found more apt for one form, as in Völundarkviða, prose, as in Velents Þáttr, for the other, but the two forms exist together, are kept in mind together, and allusion can link them. The poet of Völundarkviða, while creating in the first form, enriches his drama by allusion to anecdotes from the second, most explicitly (i) to his forging of the great sword; more cryptically (ii) to the fabricating of the escape wings, ⁴² See Chambers' notes, Widsið pp. 95, 192; R. M. Wilson 14–16, 19. We do not know who the Hælsingas are, but the fact that Vaði's patrimony was Sjøælland inclines one to link the Hælsingas with Baltic ports (Helsingør, Hålsingborg, Helsingfors).

and (iii) to the clever shooting by Egill at his flying brother. We depend on Velents Þáttr for a demonstration of the full form such anecdotes could take.

(i) The great sword Mímung

Velent promises to make the sword (here Mímungr) for the king. He forges one sword, which is superb, but he is dissatisfied with it. He files it into a heap of filings, mixes them with meal, and feeds this mixture to the farmyard fowls whom he has previously starved for three days. He then collects their droppings and refines them in his forge: the iron is purified of all soft elements (vellr nú ór járninu allt þat, er deigt var í). The sword he now makes looks marvellous and is a little shorter than the first. He repeats the refining—shortening process, and the more-than-razor-sharp Mímungr, now of perfectly balanced length, emerges. Though he promised it to the king, Velent hides it under the bellows of his forge and makes another, more ordinary, sword for the king (who does not notice the difference). The real Mímungr he keeps for his son (Velents Þáttr 97–9).

It is known that certain chemical elements in bird-droppings are effective in the refining of steel; this fact may have been known to the makers of early Germanic swords.⁴³ The lively point of the anecdote of Mímungr must have been that Velent made the birds do his chemical experiment for him. It is probably to some form of this anecdote that the poet refers in 18/5–6. When Völundr says that he hardened the sword sem mér hægst þótti, the term hægst, 'in the easiest, most convenient, readiest, most satisfactory way' is not easy to interpret precisely in the context. The change of idiom from the sharpening of the sword, sem ek hagast kunna, 'as I knew how to do most skilfully, with all my art', to the hardening of the metal—cleansing it of all its soft elements—sem mér hægst þótti, 'as seemed to me the best possible way', suggests a transition from long-trained skill to experiment, inventiveness: 'as it seemed to me . . .'. If this is so, then the poet of these lines in stanza 18 has the anecdote of Völundr's brilliant new method of metal-hardening in his mind.

(ii) The making of the wings

An anecdote—an ancient one, to judge by the Franks Casket bird-catching scene—that must have been known to the poet of Völundarkviða, but is barely used by him, is that of the making of Völundr's wings. Völundr alludes to them (I suggest) by the ambiguous term vél in stanzas 19 and 29 (see commentary). The poet has not wanted us to look closely at those wings, or think of the gathering of feathers, or the impish testing of the mechanism on Egill (Velents Þáttr 112–13). All the merry ingenuities and brotherly badinage of the anecdote may well have been known to him, but they are not for his poem. The only merriment in his story is the last laughter of Vǫlundr.

⁴³ See Ellis Davidson (a), 159–61 for references; Nedoma (a), 235–9.

(iii) Egill shoots at Vǫlundr

A third anecdote probably known to the poet of Vǫlundarkviða is that of the fake shooting of Vǫlundr by Egill (Velents Þáttir 113–15). Because he fears that the king will order Egill to shoot him down as he flies away, Velent places a blood-filled bladder beneath his left armpit, and tells Egill to pierce that with his arrow, so that the fall of blood will convince the king that he has been killed. And that indeed is what happens.

In the poem Níðuðr longs to kill or capture Vǫlundr as he flies (37/5–8), and his lament—‘No one is so strong that he can shoot you from below’—is, I suggest, a deliberately reversed variant of the anecdote of Egill’s shooting. The poet wants the picture of an impotent king abandoned, not of a self-satisfied king who thinks he has killed his enemy.

The poet manipulates the anecdotes to serve his own turn.

3. The relationship between Deor and Vǫlundarkviða

The key problem, and the most difficult, in determining the provenance of Vǫlundarkviða is the relationship between the Norse poem and Deor. Was there an Old English ‘Lay of Weland’—based on the German?—from which the maker of the Franks Casket carved crowded incidents and the poet of Deor took his references to Weland’s imprisonment and revenge? If so, was a version of this lay known to—and a source for—the poet of Vǫlundarkviða (or of an early version of Vǫlundarkviða)?⁴⁴

The remarkable correspondence of vocabulary between Deor and Vǫlundarkviða in two identical situations in each poem, (a) nēde and naudir used of the bonds placed on Weland and on Vǫlundr, and (b) ēacen and barni aukin used of Beadohild’s and Þǫðvildr’s pregnancy (see commentaries to Vǫlundarkviða 12/6, 36/2), suggests a definite relationship between the two poems—but can we define it? I do not think it is possible to assign any priority in the use of nēde/naudir to connote ‘chains’ to either Old English or Old Norse, since the recorded usage of such a sense is small in either language. However, as ēacen, ‘pregnant’, is common in Old English, but not so recorded elsewhere in Old Norse, the Norse poet may well be the borrower here.

In lines 10–11 the poet of Deor betrays the fact that he is manipulating a fuller source, a source resembling Vǫlundarkviða in the sequence of some of its events. In the Norse poem the imposition of the hofgar nauðir (12/6) and the cutting of the sinews (17/7–8) are distinct events set well apart, alternative modes of imprisonment. In Deor the terms originally alluding to the two modes of imprisonment are brought into immediate proximity and their meaning synthesized: the cut sinews cannot stand as a verse parallel to the chains, but the sense of ‘chains’ in nēde has been transferred to the useless sinews, making them now, metaphorically, the ‘bonds’—seonobende—that imprison him. This would seem to indicate that in Deor’s source the king placed nēde, ‘fetters’, on Weland (assuming the source was Old English). The poet of Deor’s clever synthesis, however, obliges us to translate his term nēde abstractly (as I have done, Appendix). While Deor could have been the source for the Norse poet’s use of aukin, ‘pregnant’, it could not have been for his use of naudir, ‘bonds’. Even if the poet of Deor had known Vǫlundarkviða and based his lines 8–12 upon it (which I think unlikely), he must have had some other source for his description of Beadohild’s brooding on her pregnancy, which has no part in Vǫlundarkviða (at least in its extant form). That the two poems drew upon a common Old English poetic source—or sources—seems most probable.

Three other words in the Níðuðr story in Vǫlundarkviða appear to be loanwords from Old English, namely, gim, ‘jewel’, 6/2; lióði, ‘lord’, 11/3; and iarnnasteina, ‘gems’, 25/10 (see commentaries ad loc.).⁴⁵ This strengthens the likelihood that the poets of Vǫlundarkviða and Deor knew an Old English version of Weland’s story which (a) contained the terms nēde and ēacen, central to the two situations of anguish common to the two extant poems, and (b) may also have contained the terms gim, lēod, eorcnanstānas, that have been used by the poet of Vǫlundarkviða in scenes that are not in Deor—the making of the jewelled ring (6), the scene of the ring-counting lord of elves (11), the fabrication of gems from eyes (25).

If the identification of lióði as a loanword from Old English is correct (see commentary to 11/3), this could mean that the representation of Vǫlundr as ‘lord of elves’ in Vǫlundarkviða was borrowed by the Old Norse poet from Old English⁴⁶ (though the precise development of the elvish theme in the poem might be that of the Old Norse poet). The parallels of ⁴⁴ This question has often been raised (cf. Schneider II. 2. iii. 89; Nedoma (a), 86 and references). It cannot be a question of close translation of an OE poem into ON (comparable to the translation of the OS Genesis into OE, which is a written work; McKinnell (b), 5–6). We must envisage an oral version by an ON poet, based on recitals of the OE poem (whether or not based on a written text), in which certain scenes and words from the recited poem were chosen and memorized in the ON poet’s mind, others perhaps omitted, varied, reinterpreted, or misunderstood—as, it would seem, in the oral transmission of ballads.

⁴⁵ I do not include my emendation íviðgirna, 28/8, nor gorsimar, 21/8 (since this is originally a Norse word, though earliest recorded in England; see commentary ad loc.).

⁴⁶ In Lazamon, Brut (c. 1200) line 21,131: on aluisc smið, ‘an elvish smith’ (called Wygar) made Arthur’s coat of mail mid aðelen his crafte, ‘with his noble skill’. This suggests that traditions of a Weland-like elvish smith, held in high regard, continued long in England.

the terms nēde/nauðir, ēacen/barni aukin in (virtually) identical contexts in Deor and Vǫlundarkviða warn us that other parallels with Old English vocabulary in the Norse poem could also relate to (virtually) identical contexts in a now lost Old English poem of Weland. The fact that ēacen occurs in a scene where Beadohild is alone, and barni aukinn in a speech of Vǫlundr to Niðuðr, shows the kind of telescoping adaptation a Norse poet might have made. When Bǫðvildr sees her father, she cannot gearolice have known she was pregnant.

Deor presents the story of Weland cryptically, in medias res. How are we to imagine an Old English narrative 'Lay of Weland' would begin? At what moment in Weland's story? If it began with the capture of the lonely smith by Niðhad, with the same motive of greed as in Vǫlundarkviða, there can have been no opening allusions to Weland's honourable career at the king's court and his fall from favour because of the jealousy of another man (as the story is told in Velents Þáttr). If the story began when Weland was already an honoured courtier, maligned by envy—a theme that might endear it to the poet of Deor—then any capture of him by night, as in Vǫlundarkviða, would simply be a police arrest. No savagery or serpent-looks would have been expected of the prisoner. There is nothing in the wording of Deor to suggest that Weland was anything but a noble human being—ānhýdig eorl, 'resolute gentleman', syllan monn, 'a better man' than the king. He does not seem elvish in any way. So too in Waldere (II. 4–10) the ancestry of Widia—Niðhādes mæg, / Welandes bearn, 'kinsman of Niðhad and child of Weland'—has no slur of rape or revenge upon it: it is proclaimed in a context of honour, when the great ðeodric intends to reward 'Weland's child' richly for rescuing him from giants' bondage.⁴⁷ In the extant poetic traditions of Weland the Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde of his nature are kept quite separate—at least on the surface. After the heavy sympathy for Weland in the first scene of Deor, we have immediately in the second scene the grievous reminder of Beadohild's brothers' deaths—but we are not told that it was Weland who cut off their heads.

The Old English evidence brings us round in a circle: direct allusions to Weland in Deor, Waldere, Alfred's Boethius suggest for him a sympathetic, even exemplary, persona in a courtly setting, while the Old English loan-words in Vǫlundarkviða—gim, (álfa) lióði, iarnasteina—together with the facts of his crimes carved on the Franks Casket, point to the cruelly inhuman persona of the elvish smith, trapped in his forge, making gems out of his enemies' eyes. It would, I think, be beyond the power of one—even hypothetical—Old English poem to reconcile in a single narrative structure the two themes to which Weland is traditionally central—that of the misused courtier and that of the despoiled prince of elves—quite simply because the circumstantial facts necessary to each theme clash. The only poetic mode that can reconcile them—by omission—is elegy. So the misery of Weland can be elaborated without any context other than allusions to Niðhad, to imprisonment, and to the disabling sinews.

⁴⁷ See Dickens 60, nn. to Fragment B 7–10, for succinct reference to MHG texts confirming Widia's aid to ðeodric.

We may note that both the poet of Deor and King Alfred refer to Weland as a man in exile—he 'explores, has his first experience of, exile' in Deor; King Alfred thinks of him as ænne wræccan.⁴⁸ This relates Weland directly to Old English elegiac tradition—to the wræclastas of the Wanderer and the Seafarer and the Lamenting Wife (ASPR III. 134 line 55, 143 line 15, 210 line 5). Within the narrative of Vǫlundarkviða the elegiac stature of Vǫlundr also emerges vividly, from the first moment of his loneliness (5/5–6), to the lament for his sword (18; cf. 6, 12, 15). After this, his melancholy turns to an energy of hatred (19).

Elegy should perhaps rank as a third traditional form in which the Weland legend was transmitted.

Appendix: Deor lines 1–13

	Weland him ꝥbe wurmanꝥ	Weland for himself ꝥ . . ꝥ
	wræces cunnade,	learned to know exile,
	ānhýdig eorl,	resolute noble,
	earfoða drēag,	endured adversities,
	hæfde him tō gesīþpe	had for companion
	sorge 7 longap,	grief and heartache,
	wintercalde wræce.	wintercold woe.
	Wēan oft onfond,	Misery many times he probed
5	sīþþan hine Niðhād on	after Niðhad upon him
	nēde legde,	imposed constraints,
	swoncre seonobende,	slack sinew-chains,
	on sýllan monn.	on a superior man.
	Þæs oferēode,	Time passed from that moment,
	þisses swā mæg.	so it may from this.
	Beadohilde ne wæs	For Beadohild not even hyre brōþra dēap	her brothers' death
	on sefan swā sār	was so sore to her heart
	swā hyre sylfre þing,	as her own case,
10	þæt heo gearolice	when she clearly ongietan hæfde	had become aware
	þæt heo ēacen wæs.	that she was with child.
	Æfre ne meahte	Never could she try

⁴⁸ Exile was the first punishment imposed upon Velent by Niðungr (for killing his steward; Velent 104).

þrīste geþencan	to think without trembling
hū ymb þæt sceolde.	how that event would turn.
Ðæs oferēode,	Time passed from that moment,
þisses swā mæg	so it may from this.

In line 1 be wurman has never been satisfactorily explained.⁴⁹ If the phrase is a miswriting of, for example, be wifmen, wifmyne 'through a woman, love of a woman',⁵⁰ we should have to reckon with some prologue about a first wife. I see little evidence for that in Old English tradition.

For lines 5–6 see Völundarkviða Introduction III. A. 3.

In lines 11–12 Æfre . . . sceolde recalls the æva skyldi of Þoðvildr's last speech (Völundarkviða 41/6), though the precise context of her thought is different. This too could be an echo from a common source.

4. Weland as Christian figura

Could the development of an elegiac character for Weland—as we see it in Deor and Alfred's Boethius—be connected with early attempts to interpret his story in Christian symbolic terms, as a heathen prefiguration of the Christian truth? If so, it might help to explain how, at a later date, the poet of Deor and King Alfred came to overlook—or see beyond—the brutal actions of their hero and praise him morally. Like Samson, with all his flaws, Weland too might stand as a figura of Christ. In the science of figura, facts irrelevant to the analogy are not significant.⁵¹

The legend of Weland could have come to England from Germany at the time of the vigorous Anglo-Saxon missions in the early eighth century. Boniface made his see at Mainz in 747, not far from the site of the seventh century gravestone at Ebersheim bearing the earliest record of the name Veland upon it: LINDIS FILIA VELANDU ET THUDELINDI.⁵² On the Franks Casket the scene in Weland's smithy has been placed in a Christian context, juxtaposed with the visitation of the Magi on the same panel. What might this signify? Weland's holding of the ring has been interpreted as a symbolic dedication of riches to God, comparable to the Magi's offering of their treasures to Christ.⁵³ Others see the prospective begetting of the hero Widia as an image of the coming of the Christ child⁵⁴

⁴⁹ As Nedoma (a), 80–3, well notes.

⁵⁰ Cf. Grein s.v. wifman, though this use of be is rare.

⁵¹ On the figural tradition of Samson, and the explications of St Caesarius of Arles, see P. Dronke (c), 128–32. Had Milton only known the biblical story of Samson, he would not have written Samson Agonistes.

⁵² See Nedoma (a), 58.

⁵³ Hauck § 7. A still earlier occurrence of Völundr's name may possibly be found on the runic solidus from Schweindorf (on which see Page (a)), dated to the late 6 c. by Nedoma (a), 35–8, on which is inscribed weladu.

⁵⁴ The suggestion is not infrequent, but I have not met well-based argument in support of it: see

(though I see nothing in the records of Widia to make him worthy of this distinction).

I would suggest that the carvings of Weland on the Gotland stone and on the tenth century English crosses (see Völundarkviða Introduction III. A. 1 (i)) point to a simpler and more profound Christian interpretation of Weland. He is portrayed escaping from the smithy on wings, bearing with him a girl. This is a rescue, a saving of the girl from the prison of the smithy, from the despair of her mortal life. It is also a swiftly comprehensible image of redemption, of the deliverance of a soul.⁵⁵

The scene of the smithy on the Casket shows the same girl, in wholly realistic action, giving the broken ring, the bond of her faith, to her rescuer—from-paternal-punishment, her saviour, to be repaired. This too can be an image of redemption, the sealing of the bond of salvation between Christ and his new bride, the Christian people, Ecclesia:⁵⁶ a bond Webster 29 (in n. 52 to this passage the statement that in Deor 'Widia's birth is also [i.e. like Christ's] presented as the triumph of good over evil' is hardly correct: there is no moral reference in the refrain lines of Deor; Ellis Davidson (b), 218–19, attempts to identify the role of Váli and that of Widia to force an identification with that of Christ, but the parallels are imperfect; the likenesses between Saxo's tale of the begetting of Váli upon Rindr and the begetting of Widia on Beadohild no doubt spring from the fact that Saxo knew Vkv and drew from it ideas for the begetting of Váli (see n. 14 above and commentary to Vsp 32/5–8); Wood 6, n. 40, relies on Ellis Davidson (though he emphasizes that 'Germanic tradition is . . . present not just because the story was a popular one, but also because it had some iconographic significance within the design of the casket as a whole').

⁵⁵ I have so far not found this image used of a living soul in early Christian iconography (apart from the Assumption of the Virgin, who is taken to heaven by two angels; Réau II. ii. 614–19 gives the earliest instance as 8 c.). The interpretation of mythological rapes, or abductions, such as the rape of Helen, Ganymede, the daughters of Leucippe, as symbols of the passage from the earthly world to a divine world, is lavishly exemplified in the bas-reliefs in the Pythagorean basilica beneath the Porta Maggiore in Rome. These abductions portray initiations, the beginning of a new understanding (Carcopino 337: 'l'enlèvement d'Hélène est une initiation': the epics of Homer have become the Bible of the neo-Pythagorean religion, 336. For his discussion of Ganymede and the daughter of Leucippe see 110–11; the figure of Zeus in the rape of Ganymede is clearly identifiable by the well-shod and trousered legs straddling the air, while head and wings denote his eagle trappings, Plate IX). This beautiful basilica, built about AD 50, was pillaged and closed shortly after its construction, not to be rediscovered (perhaps) until 1917 (Carcopino 51–2, 22–4), but images comparable to the abductions in the basilica decorate the vaults of contemporary tombs (Bendinelli 104, Strong (b), 76), and are common (notably the rape of Ganymede by the eagle) especially in Gallo-Roman sepulchral sculpture, e.g. at Igel near Trier (see also Strong (a), 220: 'A figure, or group symbolic of the rape of the soul, invariably occupies the centre of tomb ceilings; various impersonations of the soul are borne upwards on an eagle, griffin, or divinised being'). If such funerary depictions are so common, might they have been known to, and reused by, Anglo-Saxon missionaries? Would they not have met the eye of Benedict Biscop on one of his five journeys to Rome in the 7 c., to buy pictures to adorn Monkwearmouth Church (as well, perhaps, as the image of Romulus and Remus being fed by the she-wolf, which the carver of the Franks Casket knows)?

⁵⁶ Cf. Ephesians 5: 25: Christus dilexit ecclesiam. 'The early Christian marriage rings, therefore, displayed on the bezel the marriage of Christ to the Church' (Kantorowicz 215, n. 61). It is notable that in the Weland scene, while one hammer is hanging perpendicularly, presumably on the wall of the forge, a second hammer is poised slanting in mid-air above the anvil, held by no hand. This could represent the marriage-blessing Germanic hammer acting as a cross performing the same

made possible by the incarnation—which is represented on the other half of the same panel. Even more, the divine mender of the ring—who helps humanity to make reparation for error, redde quod debes—can be seen destroying the flesh of worldly avarice—the corpse is under the forge—by transforming it into the immortal gold and gems of everlasting life-after-death, now opened to man by the incarnation—to which the Magi bear witness—and by his death—which they predict in their gift of myrrh. The scene in the smithy, so richly endowed with figural potential relating to the incarnation and the redemption (my suggestions do not exhaust the possibilities) might well seem fit to place beside the epiphany of Christ.⁵⁷

We may also wonder whether the runic micropoem surrounding the front panel is wholly irrelevant to the scenes of Weland and the Magi within it. Two words, hronæs ban, ‘whale’s bone’, are outside the metrical structure: ‘High tide heaved the fish / [up] on to the headland. / The sea [?] grew troubled, / where he floundered on the sand.’⁵⁸ The Casket is made of whalebone: from the death of the whale the precious Casket and the message carved upon it have come. Weland too made treasures from the bones—the skulls and the teeth—of the dead. The whale’s belly, that harboured Jonah for three days and three nights, signifies, traditionally, the infernal regions of death where Christ likewise would stay in corde terrae for three days and three nights (Matthew 12: 38–40). When the whale dies, when Leviathan is caught on the hook, swallowing the bait of the deity incarnate who can harrow hell—agn svelgjandi á króki—then death itself is function; cf. AR §§ 78 (with illustration of a rock-carving of a hammer raised to bless a mating couple), 88, 425.

⁵⁷ If the image of Weland flying off with Beadohild had religious significance at the time of the carving of the Franks Casket, then the scene of Egill catching birds for their feathers could be a way of alluding to this to complete the religious cycle of the legend on the Casket with the taking of the soul to heaven. In the figural context it may be relevant to note the identification of wounds and jewels in Christian symbolism. In the OE Dream of the Rood the vision of gold and gems on the Cross alternates with streams of blood (6–10); the five jewels on the crossbeam are the five wounds of Christ (on early Christian imagery springing from the double use of sphragis for ‘wound’/‘gem’ see P. Dronke (c), 154–6 and references there cited). Weland’s association with the Magi would seem to have continued into the modern period: it was a custom in German-speaking lands that smiths should hammer on their anvils ceremonially on the feast of the Epiphany, to fasten more firmly the fetters of the Devil (Bächtold-Stäubli s.vv. Hammer § 5 b, Schmied B § 1 f., also B § 2 (a), (b)).

⁵⁸ I suggest reading (following mainly Napier (b), 8) Fiscflōd u[p] āhōf / on fergenberig. / Warþ gā:srcic grorn / þær hē on grēut giswom. As flōdu* would be virtually impossible, I suggest that p has been omitted at the end of the division (as perhaps mæ has been similarly omitted in su[mæ] on the back panel; Napier (b), 11). The puzzling gā:srcic I would prefer to take as a (?metathesized or miscarved) form of gārseeg, ‘ocean’ (of still undetermined etymology), rather than a nonce name for the whale, ‘Raging mighty one’ (cf. the early Gmc Gaisericus as a personal name). Grorn is only recorded (rarely) with the sense ‘miserable’, but might have had the same range of sense as gedrefed, from ‘emotionally wretched’ to ‘materially wretched’ to ‘materially disturbed’ (e.g. of water). However, if Gā:srcic is intended as a name for Leviathan, then we may translate grorn as ‘wretched’ and feel a touch of pity for him as the poet of Beowulf did for the dead dragon (2832–5).

The Franks Casket, front panel. Weland and the Magi. Reproduced by courtesy of the British Museum.

dead.⁵⁹ The image of the dying whale, stranded, thrashing the shallows in despair, can hardly be a fortuitous frame for the two scenes it presents.

King Alfred does not seem to have been greatly interested in figura. Orpheus is an ancient figura of Christ, but Alfred makes only a very platitudinous moral lesson out of his myth.⁶⁰ In Weland too he focuses on the moral value of the individual, not merely setting Weland's name in place of that of Fabricius, the ancient Roman consul proverbially famous for his moral probity, but even adapting for the goldsmith's dedication to his art the legendary praise of the Roman: that it was harder for Fabricius to be turned from honesty than for the sun to be turned from its course.⁶¹

Hwær sint nū þæs wisan	Where are now the wise
Welandes bān,	Weland's bones—
þæs goldsmiðes,	that goldsmith
þe wæs geō mærost?	who was long ago greatest in fame?
Forþy ic cwæð þæs wisan	This was the reason I said wise
Welandes bān,	Weland's bones,
forðy ængum ne mæg	that in no man may eorðbūendra	among the dwellers on earth
se cræft losian	the talent be lost
þe him Crīst onlændð.	that Christ lends him.
Ne mæg mon æfre þy ēð	One can never any the more easily
ænne wræccan	from an outcast wretch
his cræftes beniman,	take away his talent
þe mon oncerran mæg	than one can divert sunnan onswīfan	the sun to swerve aside
7 ðisne swiftan rōdor	and this swift sky of his rihtryne	from its right course
rinca ænig.	—not any man can.
Hwā wāt nū þæs wisan	Who knows now of the wise
Welandes bān,	Weland's bones,
on hwelcum hī hlæwa	in which of the grave-mounds
hrūsan þeccan?	they may cover the earth?

⁵⁹ Cf. Job 41: 1 (Vulgate 40: 20): 'Canst thou draw out Leviathan with an hook?' Christ as fisher of souls is portrayed in 2 c. catacombs in Rome (Réau II. 21). Later the Cross, symbol of his human death, becomes the hook on which the whale is caught: Christ is the bait (the citation is from Lilja 60 (Skjald B II. 406), by Eysteinn Ásgrímsson, †1361); cf. Rabanus Maurus, for whom the divinity of Christ was the fish-hook (De Universo VIII. v ('De piscibus'), col. 240v: hamus divinitas Filii Dei, quae carne induta latuit hamus in esca). On the Franks Casket (I am aware) there is no fish-hook, as the whale is stranded; but for a fish, the fish-hook is a metaphor of death.

⁶⁰ For Alfred, Boethius 103, Orpheus' fatal backward glance at Eurydice teaches the moral that a man who seeks God's true light should never turn back to his old sins.

⁶¹ Eutropius, writing in the 4 c., records how Pyrrhus, King of Epirus (c. 282 BC), declared Ille est Fabricius, qui difficilius ab honestate quam sol a cursu suo averti potest (Breviarium II. xiii. 2). It is a remarkably forceful statement to apply to Weland, and we must suppose it reflects Alfred's interpretation of the hero. I thank Jane Beverley for identifying the author of Alfred's citation (for which see ASPR V. 166).

This remarkable exaltation of Weland would not, I think, have occurred to King Alfred if he had known only a savage tale of imprisonment and revenge. He has been taught to see a moral aspect to the story, and he expresses it in terms of lament. Is Alfred recalling Deor when he adorns his praise of Weland with a refrain and pities him as ænne wræccan?

B. The swan maiden sequence

'The homeland of the Swan Maiden story, the regions within which it would arise ever-new and be nourished by annual observation, must be sought in the far north of the Eurasian and American continents . . . The nature of the Swan Maiden story and its distribution in Eurasia and North America suggest that it is an archaic story. It is the sort of story that might be many thousands of years old. The earliest date that has emerged during this discussion, however, is c. 300 (?) in China'.⁶²

In VǪlundarkviða the traditional pattern of the swan maiden legend has been altered in several respects (see VǪlundarkviða Introduction II. A), in order to adapt it to the succeeding story of VǪlundr the smith. The traditional pattern must have been familiar to the writer of the prose prologue, however, since he notes that, while the women were spinning, their swan skins—álp tarhamir—lay beside them. He does not say that the brothers took these away from them, no doubt because this would too grossly contradict the poem.

Despite the divergence of the swan maiden sequence in VǪlundarkviða from the traditional pattern of the swan maiden legend, that legend, with its theme of migratory change, must still be the source of the story in VǪlundarkviða 1–3. The Dream of Óengus could be regarded as yet another variant of the swan maiden legend, in which the migratory change of mood in the swan maiden has been 'rationalized' as a fairy power to change from a swan one year to a girl the next, a wilful power completely under the control of the girl herself. While the Dream is composed of several well-known Irish saga-motifs, the annually alternating swan–girl nature of the heroine does not seem to be one of them. The accepted dating to the eighth century precludes Norse influence.

In VǪlundarkviða one term that is used of the swan maidens would seem to have been borrowed from Old English: alvitr (see commentary to 1/3). In the case of other Old English loanwords in the poem, I have suggested that they might have been borrowed from scenes in a lost Old English poem comparable to those in VǪlundarkviða where the loanwords occur (see VǪlundarkviða Introduction III. A. 3). To suggest this of alvitr would imply that the swan maiden sequence, or a variant of it, formed the opening of the hypothetical Old English narrative lay known to the poet of Völundarkviða. But I see no evidence for this in Old English Weland tradition. More probably the poet was using a general term already assimilated into Norse from Old English for supernatural beings.

⁶² Hatto 283, 287.

The motif of taking away a transforming garment, of bird or beast, in order to restore human form is not uncommon in folk-tale. A remarkable instance in a fourteenth century south German romance, Friedrich von Schwaben, shows links with Völundarkviða. Friedrich's beloved, Angelburg, is cursed with shape-changes by a cruel stepmother: first she is a stag, then a dove. As a dove, she bathes—with two court maidens also transformed into doves—every day in a well on a mountain. Their dove-garments lie beside them while they bathe. If Friedrich can find the well, steal the feather garments, and if one of the girls will choose him as her husband, the girls will be released from the malignant spell. After much dangerous adventure, Friedrich succeeds. The lovers are united; his two brothers marry the two court maidens; the stepmother is burned. After nine years of marriage, Angelburg dies.

The parallels with Völundarkviða and its prose prologue are striking. The taking of the bird-garments while the girls are bathing recalls the traditional pattern of the swan maiden legend (see Völundarkviða Introduction II. A). The marriage of the three maidens to three brothers recalls Völundarkviða, as does the loss of the wife after nine years. Most remarkable, perhaps, is that in the earliest MSS. Friedrich, on his quest for Angelburg, calls himself Wieland. Some scholars regard this association of Wieland with bird maidens and the stealing of their enchanted garments, in a German romance, as evidence that the swan maiden legend was not a Norse addition to the Germanic story of Weland.⁶³ However, the fact that only the Norse poem has the triple marriage and the departure of the wives after nine years, suggests very strongly that Friedrich has (ultimately) a Norse version of the Völundr story behind it. German merchant communities in Norway could well have heard Völundarkviða in return for their stories of Velent (see Völundarkviða Introduction III. A. I (ii)). For us, Friedrich is most valuable in that it shares with the prose prologue to Völundarkviða the motif of the stealing of the bird-garments, which is an integral part of the traditional swan maiden legend. This motif has been discarded by the Völundarkviða poet, but I would suppose it was in his source. This 'older' version could continue to be current in Norwegian tradition alongside the Völundarkviða text that we now have, to be used by the writer of the prose prologue and by the poet of Friedrich.

⁶³ Cf. JH Vkv 42.

C. The Lappish connection

The author of the prose prologue identifies Níðuðr as a king in Sweden and Völundr and his two brothers as sons of the king of the Lapps. These young royal Lapps, wide-ranging hunters, settle in Nordic-named Úlfdalir, which is claimed by Níðuðr as his land (so it would seem, 14/9; DH). It is this that brings Völundr within his power. Völundarkviða now presents a racial confrontation between Lapps and Swedes, in which the Nordic authorities assume their accustomed sovereignty and the Lapps repay them with treacherous and insidious magic. This narrative formula is familiar to the Norse thirteenth century historians.⁶⁴

Why should Völundr have been identified as a Lapp in the prose prologue? The poem tells us nothing about his human background. Widsið and Velents Páttir place his ancestors in the Baltic (see n. 42). I can only suppose that in a north Norwegian community in frequent contact with the Lapps, Norsemen might have recognized similarities between motifs in Völundr's story and some Lappish legends and traditions. He was a fantastic smith, remaking human heads (like the Siberian, and in earlier tradition perhaps also the Lappish, divine smith who forged shamans), and he escaped by flight, like shamans of legend and living shamans who claimed to go on trance journeys through air and water. Völundr certainly does not resemble any other Germanic hero whose story is extant.

Two Norwegians from northern Norway give good testimony to their familiarity with the Lapps. Both also have some link with the story of Völundr. Eyvindr Finnsson skáldaspillir was of a noble Hálógaland family (according to Landnámabók 348–9, Egils Saga 56–7). During the terrible snowy summers under the Eiríkssons he notes ironically how they have to imitate the Lapps and bring their birch-nibbling flocks indoors (Heimskringla I. 221, Skjald B I. 65). He is the first skald to allude to Egill, Völundr's brother (see Völundarkviða Introduction III. A. I (i)). That Egill should have been identified as a Lapp fits well with the high—indeed magical—reputation of Lappish bowmen in Norwegian tradition ('whatever they aim at, they hit').⁶⁵

The second Norwegian who, we know, knew the Lapps, and who could have known legends of Weland/Völundr also, is the merchant Ohthere, who visited King Alfred. He too was from Hálógaland, and the most northerly inhabitant of Norway (he told the King), in the narrowest strip of that land where it could be cultivated. It was only three miles there from the coast to the mountains, and in those mountains lived the Lapps. He had explored the northern ocean to the White Sea. There the Beormas (probably itinerant Karelian Finns) 'told him many tales both about their own land and about the surrounding lands'. These tales may well have been somewhat 'tall', for Ohthere adds (perhaps in response to a stern question from the truth-loving King Alfred) that 'he did not know whether it was all true, as he had not seen it himself'. From his remark that 'it seemed to him that the Beormas and the Lapps spoke almost the same language', I would infer that he was keenly interested in the tongues of the people he sailed among and perhaps had a knowledge of some Lappish.⁶⁶

⁶⁴ For instance, the hanging of Agni by his Lappish wife, whose father he has killed in battle (Hkr I. 37–8); the deadly infatuation of Haraldr hárfagri for the magically preserved corpse of his Lappish wife (Hkr I. 126–7); the compliance of the Lapps in tax-paying, based on fear, though they pretend friendship (Egil 27).

⁶⁵ Cf. Hkr I. 135, 362; Tolley (a), 67. The second skald to allude to Egill's arrows, Hallfreðr, was said to be the son of a Hálógaland, Ottarr, whose name is the same as that of the explorer Ohthere; could Hallfreðr have been a descendant of Ohthere's family?

It could be from Ohthere's visit to the English court that the poem of Weland came to Norway. The King had a warm interest in Weland; probably both the Orosius, in which he inserts the account of Ohthere's visit, and the Boethius, in which he praises Weland, were composed in the last five years of Alfred's life. Everything we know about the elements that make up Vqlundarkviða suggests that Ohthere's visit was significant, if we make certain assumptions: (a) that at the English court Ohthere and his men were entertained with stories and lays, one or more on the theme of Weland; (b) that Ohthere returned home to Hálogaland via the court of King Haraldr hárfagri, giving him news of the English court and his entertainment, from which Haraldr's poet Þjóðólfr might have learnt of the tale of Vqlundr, that inspired his giant kenning Grjót-Níðuðr; (c) that on Ohthere's return to Hálogaland the tale of Weland/Vqlundr became known among his circle and in his district, attracting particular interest because of the 'Lappish' motifs of reforging human bodies and escape by flight through the air: attracting too, perhaps, the addition of a Lappish-style shamanic love-story to give a radiant opening to the dark tale and motivate more clearly the traditional melancholy of the hero, inherited from his elegiac Anglo-Saxon past.⁶⁷

⁶⁶ For the text and discussion of 'Ohthere's Voyage' see A. S. C. Ross; Lund; Tolley (a), 56–8.

⁶⁷ I am aware that we must be cautious in attributing the swan maiden legend and motifs related to shamanic cultures (as presented in general studies of shamanism) specifically to Lappish tradition. Hatto emphasizes the vastness of the homeland of the swan maiden 'in the far north of the Eurasian and American continents', which 'coincides largely with the region in which the classic forms of shamanism occur'. Recorded Lappish traditions do not emphasize any sexual relationship between the shaman and his female helping spirit, though other shamanic traditions do. Hatto cites Waley, The Nine Songs (13–16, and the songs themselves) as evidence that the shaman's spirit—which is always of the opposite sex—may be conceived of as his lover, enamoured of him: when he emerges from his trance he 'feels as though abandoned by his . . . spirit lover, who ascends to heaven'. The Norse Vqlundr shares this intensity of feeling in a comparable, magical, mystical, situation (5, 10). See also Sternberg 472–511 for fuller documentation of shaman and spirit wife in Siberian shamanism (recorded from the early 20 c.). The Finno-Ugrian traditions neighbouring Ohthere's lands may have been richer in his day than modern record suggests (see the analogues in

This is a rough sketch of the possible development of the poem of Vqlundr in Norway, drawn simply by linking one fortuitous dot of record with another. Other dots that I have not yet found might change its outline, but (I am inclined to think) perhaps not radically.

D. The Icelandic connection

Ásgeir Blöndal Magnússon closes his fine analysis of ögurstund by pointing out that not only ögurstund, but also húnn, 'bear cub', used affectionately for 'child', and veðreygr, 'weather-eyed' (see commentary to 4/2), are terms found in Icelandic but not in Norwegian. And all three are in Vqlundarkviða. Ásgeir asks, could not the poem have been composed in Iceland just as well as in Norway? If for 'composed' we substitute 'given its final form', I would agree with Ásgeir. The three Icelandic words match the characteristic idiom of the poem. When Vqlundr cuts off the heads 'of those young cubs', húna þeira, he is treating them like the bears he hunts and eats. But when Níðuðr begs to know what has become of 'my thriving young cubs', heilom . . . húnom mínom, húnn is the term a kindly father uses. Níðuðr, from his first utterance, has a genial, jocular quality about him (cf. 14; so too, most often, in Velents Þáttr). He is designed by the poet to be a man who will mourn deeply for his lost boys and be overwhelmed by the rape of his doted-on little daughter—such pretty eyelashes, so bright in her dresses. These are the insights of characterization through dialogue and detail that we have learned to look for in Icelandic saga tradition:

Hqskuldr átti sér dóttur, er Hallgerðr hét. Hon lék sér á gólfinu við aðrar meyjar; hon var fríð sýnum ok mikil vexti ok hárit svá fagrt sem silki ok svá mikit, at þat tók ofan á belti. Hqskuldr kallar á hana: 'Far þú hingat til mín,' sagði hann. Hon gekk þegar til hans. Hann tók undir kverkina ok kyssti hana; síðan gekk hon í braut. Þá ræddi Hqskuldr til Hrúts: 'Hversu lízk þér á mey þessa? Þykki þér eigi fgr vera?'

Hqskuldr had a daughter, called Hallgerðr. She was playing with other girls on the floor; she was lovely to look at and very tall and her hair was as glossy as silk and so long that it reached down to her belt. Hqskuldr calls to her: 'Come here to me,' he said. She went to him straightaway. He took her by the chin and kissed her; then she went away. Hqskuldr then said to Hrútr: 'How does this girl strike you? Don't you think she's beautiful?'

(Njáls Saga 6–7, ch. 1)

Ugric mythology adduced by Motz (e), 57; these are difficult to evaluate without citation of the sources, at least in translation).

Scholars have seen an Icelandic element in the cruel, clever queen: she recalls in her persecution of the hero the malevolent queens of the formaldarsögur, with their folk-tale spitefulness.⁶⁸ The queen has a function in the poem: because she is there to order the mutilation of VǪlundr, Níðuðr can consistently maintain his gentler character and deserve the pathos of his last scene.⁶⁹ If the poet has drawn upon popular Icelandic traditions here, he may have done so to perfect the structure of the poem where it was weakest, namely, perhaps, in a crude representation of a tyrant Níðuðr (cruel enough to inspire a new kenning for giants in Norway).

Icelanders have given its ultimate home to this wandering poem in their manuscripts, and in the course of its oral transmission through earlier generations reciters may well have touched it with insights into scenes and situations and tones of colloquial speech which we now wish to associate with Icelandic tradition, because nothing quite comparable survives from Norway. In the tenth century, however, when poets with the genius of Eyvindr composed in Norway at the same royal courts as the Icelandic skalds, it would be difficult to assert that an Icelander rather than a Norwegian created VǪlundarkviða. I would have supposed that the poem based on Old English traditions was given a form, close to that we know, in Hálogaland; then carried by Icelanders—great admirers of Norwegian poets, as we know—to Iceland, where it survived as the inheritor of common Norse traditions of narrative and idiom, the cultivation of which continued to develop in Iceland rather than in Norway.

I would see a more tangible mark of the poem's later career in Iceland in the one serious flaw in the extant text, the attribution of royal historical fathers to the flying swan maidens (15). Where else would heroic valkyrie traditions be as familiar and well cultivated as in Iceland—the land of the Rímur, where indeed we find the only swan maiden who flies eagerly to battle (see commentary to VǪlundarkviða 1/1).

IV. The Text of VǪlundarkviða

A. Discrepancies

At some time a reciter has made alterations to the text and has not coordinated the new details with the old. From this arises one serious discrepancy of fact in the poem.

There are four names for the three wives: Egill has Qlrún (named in 5/2, 15/7), VǪlundr has a 'daughter of Hlǫðvér' (11/6: i.e. either the Hlaðguðr or the Hervǫr of 15/5), and Slagfiðr has Svanhvít (5/4), whose name is not included with those of the other wives in 15/5–8. The author of the prose prologue has cleverly combined Hlaðguðr–Svanhvít and Hervǫr–Alvitr (taking alvitr, 11/7, as a proper noun),⁷⁰ so that Slagfiðr can marry Svanhvít (5/4) and VǪlundr Alvitr (11/7) and still have a king as father-in-law. But this must be ingenuity, not tradition.

⁶⁸ Notoriously Hvít and Skuld in Hrólfr chs. 25–30, 47–52.

⁶⁹ See n. 26 above.

In no source other than VǪlundarkviða is VǪlundr given a wife (other than Bǫðvildr). Egill, however, is associated with Qlrún in Velents Þáttr: after his feat of cleaving the apple on his little son's head he became 'most famous of all men, and people call him Qlrúnar-Egill' (Velents Þáttr 111). His association with Qlrún must be based on wider tradition than VǪlundarkviða alone. How could she be relevant to the story of the apple-shooting—apart from being, perhaps, the boy's mother? Is part of Qlrún's tradition recorded on the Franks Casket, in the scene where Egill is directing his arrows against armed attackers—is she the woman sitting in the house behind him, and did she gain her fame by giving—or not giving—Egill a strand of her hair when his bowstring broke? There must have been some legend (though not necessarily this one!), and the poet of VǪlundarkviða 5/1–2 would have known it.

Before the swan maidens were made part of the story, there existed the legends of Egill and his wife Qlrún and his brother VǪlundr. But now Qlrún is made a swan maiden, and the two brothers become three, as in so many archaic folk-tales, to form an idyllic marital trio. The pre-existing legendary material on Egill, Qlrún, and VǪlundr, which is fundamentally pragmatic, has been lightly fitted into a formal pattern of folk-myth, which is fundamentally unreal. This 'fitting' is simply achieved by omitting any information about Egill and Qlrún, and inventing a third brother, whose wife is given what seems a perfect archetypal name for a swan maiden, Svanhvít. We only know the two wives' names in the swan maiden sequence because Egill and Slagfiðr go to seek them. Here the citing of their names cleverly implies the process of human domestication in their years of marriage: they are not named when they first embrace their lovers and they are not named when they fly away as swans. Their names are left behind as human trappings.

We might suppose that VǪlundr's swan wife also had a human name, but it is not identified precisely in the poem. When she is first mentioned after her departure, as VǪlundr awaits her return, she is only referred to as 'his radiant wife' (6/5). When the ring has gone from the cord, he thinks 'Hlǫðvér's daughter' has taken it. This identification is borrowed from 15/5–6, for the reason, I suspect, that the poet's text never gave a name to VǪlundr's wife. Had there been a name for the third swan wife, would it not have alliterated with Völundr, to match Egill and Qlrun, Slagfiör and Svanhvít? As there would be no tradition of Völundr as a swan maiden's husband before the creation of Völundarkviða, his wife's name would have to be invented for him, like Slagfiör's Svanhvít. If lines 15/5–8 were inserted to provide a royal origin for noble valkyrie wives, as seems probable (see commentary to 1/1, 1/4, 15/5–8), then we cannot allow much authority to Hljöðvís dóttir in 11/6. I would suggest that the poet intended Völundr's swan wife to remain a nameless figure in the poem, a haunting draumbrúðr from the past. Structurally and emotionally there is no moment in the text when a specific name for Völundr's wife would serve any purpose. By contrast, in the scene of the pursuit of the other two wives, it is through the citing of their names that the emotional situation is so swiftly and intimately conveyed (5/1–4).

⁷⁰ In the MS. personal names are not given an initial capital (unless they begin a sentence).

Though Hljöðvís dóttir, is not, I think, original to the poem, but based on the name-list in 15/5–8, which also, I think, is not original to the poem, it is delicately inserted into the text and provides a variation on 6/5–6. But 6/5–6 probably represents a shortened and defective text. It would seem that we do not have an undisturbed text of any of the stanzas in which Völundr thinks of his married life (6, 11, 15). The royal pedigrees proper to valkyrie wives have been imposed upon the swan wives in the only place where they could possibly be fitted in, in Völundr's dreams and memories. Perhaps that is why those stanzas are disturbed.

The two other textual discrepancies in the poem are slight and possibly not unintentional: Myrkvið, 1/2 . . . á myrkvan við, 3/8, and sögðo, 40/2 . . . sagði, 41/2 (see commentaries ad loc.).

B. Lacunae in the text

Though the pace of the poem is rapid and often curt, there is only one gap in narrative continuity. Between stanzas 25 and 26 we need a statement that Bøðvildr broke her ring and, because of that, went to visit Völundr; see Völundarkviða Introduction II D.

In the MS. stanza 16 begins abruptly: Hón inn um gekk . . . There is no antecedent for Hón. As 16/1–2 are virtually identical with 30/3–4, I would suppose that the poet intended the two appearances of the queen to be linked by a repetition of the same opening lines, namely 30/1–4. In writing stanza 16 a scribe has inadvertently omitted the first two lines of the refrain-like opening. It is possible that this error was caused in some way by the insertion of the unoriginal lines 15/5–8.

In two stanzas the metre lacks an alliterating word in the b-line. In 10/6 I have supplied biart, in 18/2 skyggt. These metrically defective lines may well need greater surgery than this, but I would not venture upon it. That the scribe might accidentally omit a necessary alliterating word is evident from his omission of vinna, 41/8.

The MS. misspelling 'onondar' for Völundar, 2/10, shows that there have been corrupt or illegible letters in the scribe's exemplar. Comparable illegibility may have caused lines to be blurred and lost in stanzas 6 and 13 (see commentaries ad loc.). Here however the narrative continuity is not lost, as it is between stanzas 25 and 26.

We may also count as lacunae in the text the lines that have been replaced by 11/6 and 15/6–8.

C. Redundancies in the text

In this succinct poem the repetitive thought and vocabulary of 18/7–8, 9–10 stands out (see commentary to 18/1–10). In oral tradition an elegiac soliloquy might breed more otiose variants than would stanzas of direct narrative import. Repetition elsewhere in the text is poetically integrated.

D. Stanza length, repetition, and verbal play

There is great variety of length in the stanzas of the poem, but even within the longer stanzas, the favoured unit is of four lines. Of the poem's forty-one stanzas only fourteen have the eight-line structure most usual in fornyrðislag; of these fourteen stanzas, twelve have a full stop at the fourth line. There are ten independent stanzas of four lines only. Of the eight ten-line stanzas all contain one or two sense-units of four lines; in four of these stanzas, a sequence of two lines at the centre expresses a turning point, a moment of insight, of achievement, between the four lines that precede and the four that follow: so in stanza 10, lines 5–6 explain how the first four-line unit, of the swift returning hunter, relates to the second, of the roasting fire blazing up before Völundr—he has brought home a slain bear; and in stanza 17, lines 5–6 show us the sudden insight of the queen, who has been watching Völundr (lines 1–4), an insight that makes her command the cutting of his sinews (lines 7–10). A comparable significance could be argued for the central lines 5–6 in stanzas 29 and 41. The twelve-line stanza 35 and the sixteen-line stanza 25 are built entirely of four-line units. The fourteen-line stanzas 18 and 33 each have a unit of six lines, followed by two four-line units (in 33 this arrangement is particularly elegant and syntactically neat). Of the five six-line stanzas, two are defective (6 and 26), but the remaining three (4, 5, 39) are a perfect demonstration of how expressively such a brief metrical form can be diversified to serve different subject-matter (note the remarkable way in which the repeated assonance in 4—auða . . . út . . . inn . . . um—gives the impression that the men are open-mouthed as they gaze at the emptiness; and in 39, how the father's words falter as his command to the thrall is broken by images of his daughter).

The regular recurrence of the four-line unit, within the varying structures of the majority of the stanzas, as well as independently (ten times), gives a steady harmony and pace to the poem. This harmony is strengthened by the many repetitions and reminiscences that bind the poem with echoes. For example, the visit of the swan maidens opens with the maidens flying steadily towards their northern lake—Meyiar flugo—and ends with them obsessed with anxiety to get away—Meyiar fjystoz—as winter was sending its first snows for the skiers. The simple change of word reflects the changed heart of the swan maidens, and the repetition of alvítr ungar / orlög drýgja closes the incident for them. These repetitions in stanzas 1 and 3 establish a technique of repetition for the rest of the poem. In almost all the phrases repeated or echoed one can see—by hindsight—an element of warning: the swan maidens are alien creatures, fate-bound, they cannot stay in a human life; the hunter speeds home with a tempest at his heels, to find—worse than a tempest—desolation and capture (4/1–2, 10/1–2). In this charged atmosphere even simple statements repeated—‘In they walked down the length of the hall’—seem haunted by what is to happen next (8/3–4, 16/3–4, 30/3–4). The repetition vaknaði / vilialauss . . . Vaki ek ávalt / vilialauss (12/3–4, 31/1–2)—Völundr waking in fetters, Níðuðr kept awake by terror—could be said to express a simple irony of reversal. But between those two points of repeated phrasing lies another kernel of irony (19/1): when Völundr is captive he does not sleep—né hann svaf—ever—ávalt, just like Níðuðr. Völundr's wakefulness is Níðuðr's undoing. This is a delicate net of verbal echoes. A more blatant, Grand Guignol mode of haunting repetition presages the two boys' murders (21/1–4, 24/1–4). They approach the treasure chest, demand the keys—arrogant little king's sons—and malignancy incarnate stands behind them as they look in. On their first visit Völundr is welcoming, talkative (22). On their second visit, the same four lines of their approach to the treasure are repeated—Kómo til kisto . . . (24). This time Völundr does not use words—that might make them turn their heads—but silently severs their craning necks. The poet's audience are well warned by repetition here.

The summit of repetition in the poem is Völundr's last speech to Níðuðr. He recites the actions he performed when he killed the boys, just as the poet had narrated them (34, 35, cf. 24). The literal, factual recitation expresses more chillingly than any other way could, the detachment of the killer towards his killings. We may compare the remote calm of Apollo as he skins Marsyas in Titian's painting.

Often linked with the repetition is verbal play with double meanings:

nauðr / nauðir, inner compulsion and external constraint; vilialauss, ineffectual will, lack of joy; opin, literally opened, figuratively revealed; vél, treachery, clever contraption. Other instances of verbal play are not linked with repetition, but lie discreetly within their context: teygiaz, stretch out, be tempted (17/1), sýndiz, seemed, displayed themselves (21/6), qgurstund, grievous time, time of the turn of the tide (41/5). For the most part these subtleties spring up within a poetic language of simple style, in which the poet can express a girl's self-betraying naiveté—Þoriga ek at segia, / nema þér einom (26/5–6)—and vary the dramatic tones for Völundr when he authoritatively organizes the boys' second visit—ykr læt ek þat gull / um gefit verða—and its secrecy—Segiða meyiom / né salþióðom, / manne engom . . .—and when he unctuously soothes Þoðvildr's fears—‘father will think the ring far fairer, and mother will think it much better’—as if talking to a very little girl (22, 27). While the poet will make a rare, exotic word stand out in context—En ór augom / iarknasteina—he seems to have little use for traditional poetic diction. Drósir and fira (1/7, 2/3) are probably used with specific intent (see commentary ad loc.). That Níðuðr's men should be dignified with the heroic appellations iqfrar and rekkar (13/1, 29/4), may well be an ironic comment on their valour, which requires a multitude to chain and maim one man.

E. Metrical notes

As in Rígsþula, the ancient popular oral tradition of alliterating on finite verbs is well developed, occurring more than thirty times in forty-one stanzas:

Þær á sævar strönd
settuz at hvílaz . . .
Kell mik í hofuð
—køld ero mér ráð þín.

Frequently too the verb contributes to the alliteration quite freely:

Bar hann hana bióri,
þviat hann betr kunni . . .
sló hann brióstkringlor,
sendi Þoðvildi.

More rarely, the convention that the first stressed syllable in the b-line should bear the alliteration is neglected, and the last stressed syllable alliterates:

þótt vér kván eigim,
þá er þér kunnið . . .
Gakk þú til smiðio,
þeirar er þu gørðir.

Here the forceful rhythms of colloquial argument seem to take over. Compare the excellent use of this divergent metrical pattern (where an adverb bears the alliteration) in 38/3-4:

en ókátr Níðuðr
sat þá epter.

The delayed alliterating stress makes him seem even more abandoned. The distinction between a- and b-lines is not strictly observed if instinctive expression suggests otherwise (or so it would seem).

Some lines in the poem are metrically short in their MS. form, because in the language of the thirteenth century MS. (a) contraction of vowels in hiatus has already occurred, e.g. sáoz, 'they saw', tét 'shown', have become sáz, tét, and (b) where two vowels remain in hiatus, e.g. híu, 'household', Kíarr, the first becomes consonantal and the second is lengthened—hiú, Kíarr—so conforming to the pattern of development of original diphthongs. So words in the poem originally disyllabic are now written as monosyllables.⁷¹ If we allow for this change, there remain few lines in the poem technically short.⁷²

Excursus: Vqlundr and Cardillac

In seeking analogues for the legend of Vqlundr, I remembered that of the goldsmith Cardillac in Hindemith's opera. The source of the opera's two libretti was Hoffmann's long tale, Das Fräulein von Scuderi, set in the Paris of Louis XIV. Readers of Vqlundarkviða, who also read Das Fräulein von Scuderi, may be struck by certain echoes of the poem in the prose tale. Hoffmann finished the first sketch of his tale in 1818; it first appeared in print in 1820.⁷³ The first German translation of Vqlundarkviða (by Prof. Gräter) was published in 1812.⁷⁴

In no earlier version of Das Fräulein von Scuderi is the nocturnal terror on ⁷¹ See Norreen §§ 130, 133 b2.

⁷² Cf. 12/4, 31/2: vihlalauss; perhaps 17/9: sina magni, see textual note; 21/7: at væri gull rautt.

⁷³ I am indebted for the information on the libretti of Cardillac and their known sources to Schilling esp. 16-24. My references to the text of Das Fräulein von Scuderi are to E. T. A. Hoffmanns sämtliche Werke. Musicologists may well be aware of Cardillac's debt to Vkv, but I have not yet found any statement about it.

⁷⁴ There are some obvious mistakes in this early translation (e.g. of 17/1, 6, 19/3-4, 24/3), but I do not think they affect the issue.

the streets of Paris caused by a goldsmith, but by a cutpurse and his gang (thieves, but not murderers). In an analogue which is thought to have influenced Hoffmann, a shoemaker of Venice murders and steals by night to gather money for his patron saint.

Critics acknowledge that the character of Cardillac must be Hoffmann's own invention. He was well read in psychology, deeply interested in pathological conditions of the mind, especially the mind of the creative artist. It is no slur upon Hoffmann's originality to suggest that he was inspired by the elvish smith of Das Lied von dem finnischen Königssohn Wölunder to make his murderer a genius goldsmith: that he found in the Nordic hero the demonic creativity, possessive obsession, 'Brutalität und Empfindlichkeit' (Schneider's phrase⁷⁵), which he studied in human nature in his own writings.

I note briefly the main moments in Hoffmann's tale which recall lines of Vqlundarkviða.

Cardillac, highly revered as a supreme genius in his craft and as an honest citizen, was by night a thief and murderer, stealing back the masterpieces he had just made and stabbing their new owner. Had people taken note of the strange glance of his 'small, deep-set, green-glinting eyes', they might have suspected in him 'secret spite and malignity' (154-5). We may compare Vqlundarkviða 17, when the queen sees from his snake-like eyes Vqlundr's evil will. The German text of the stanza reads:

Thm nassen gewiss	'His teeth truly
Die Zähne drob,	salivate at the sight,
Sieht er das Schwert	if he sees the sword
An deinen Lenden	at your side
Und an Bodwilden	and on Bqðvildr
Den rothen Ring!'	the red ring!'
Da ward ihm ein Auge	Then his eye became that
Der hässlichsten Schlange:	of the most hateful snake:
'Reisst ihm entzwei	'Tear asunder
Die starken Sehnen . . .	his strong sinews . . .'

Every commission that came to him Cardillac began with burning zeal and delight: 'The work gave him no rest, day and night people heard him hammering in his workshop' (155). Three stanzas, Vqlundarkviða 6, 11, 19, show Vqlundr intent upon his work or counting the rings, always in an atmosphere of suspense, either waiting for his wife's return, or working out his vengeance. Stanza 19 reads in the German text:

⁷⁵ Schneider II. ii. 75. Schneider's discussion of Vkv has many fine insights. Hoffmann characteristically invents a gruseome physical-psychological cause for the murderous avarice of Cardillac. When his mother is pregnant, she is fascinated by the jewelled chain worn by a man she once loved. As she reaches to feel the jewels, the man falls dead. This prenatal experience marks Cardillac for life.

Er sass und schlief nicht viel,	He sat and slept little,
Doch schlug er mit seinem	but smote with his
Hammer gut,	hammer well,
Und machte, was seinem	and made what pleased
Herrn gefiel.	his master.

But as soon as the work was done—and with great reluctance yielded up—Cardillac could not suppress the 'most profound sense of resentment, an inner fury seething in him' (155). He became inconsolable, haunted, as he confesses: 'Day and night the person for whom I laboured stood like a ghost before my eyes, adorned with my handiwork, and a voice whispered in my ears—"It is yours, yours—take it then—what have diamonds to do with the dead!"' (183). For Cardillac's fury of resentment, we have the parallel of Völundarkviða 18, very simply rendered:

'An Niduders Gürtel	'At Niðuðr's belt
Glänzt ein Schwert,	gleams a sword,
Das hatt' ich aufs beste	that I had in the finest way
Gewetzet mir,	whetted for myself,
Das hatt' ich aufs beste	that I had in the finest way
Gehärtet mir!	hardened for myself!
Und nun ist nimmer,	And now it is never,
Nimmer mehr hier!	nevermore here!
Und meines Weibes	And my wife's
Rothen Ring	red ring
Trägt nun Niduders	Niðuðr's daughter
Tochter vor mir!	now wears before my eyes!
Mir aber, aber	But for me, but for me
Wird nichts dafür!	there is nothing in return!

And for the ghostly figure that stands beside Cardillac, could we be indebted to Völundr's haunting conviction that his wife will return—has returned—for her ring (stanzas 6, 11)? The German text here reads:

Schmelzt rothes Gold,	Smelts red gold,
Und schmiedet drunter	and sets within it
Edelgestein,	precious gems,
Und nimmt die Ringe	and takes the rings,
Und schliesst sie ein.	and closes them.
So harri' er seines	So he waited for his
Weibes hier!	wife here!
O käm die Schöne	O might the lovely one come
Zurück zu mir! . . .	back to me! . . .

Nimmt seine Ringe,	Takes his rings,
Und zählet sie,	and counts them,
Doch Einen darunter	yet one from among them
Trifft er nie!	he never finds!
Wär' Chlodwigs Tochter	Could Hloðver's daughter
(So fällt ihm ein!)	(so the thought strikes him!)
Alwitra, die junge,	Alvitr, the young one,
Wieder daheim?	be home again?

The smith's delighted image of his wife's return and her (to him symbolic) retaking of the ring he made for her, has been transformed for Cardillac into the hated image of the one who has bereaved him of his precious handiwork.

Now for Cardillac it is not enough to steal back his masterpieces: he must also kill: 'I projected an unspeakable hatred on to the persons for whom I had made the jewellery. In the depths of my being a desire to murder stirred against them, before which I myself shuddered' (183). Here Cardillac is human, in a way that Völundr is not. But Völundr's swift instinct to murder the two boys who covet his treasure (Völundarkviða 24 – 25/4) has its reflection in the hatred that rises in Cardillac:

Sie kamen zu Kiste,	They came to the coffer,
Fordern den Schlüssel	demanding the key,
Flugs stand sie offen,	straightway it stood open,
Da sah'n sie 'rein.	they saw then inside.
Und beiden schlug er	And he struck from both of them
Das Haupt vom Rumpfe;	the head from the body;
Den aber grub er	but the body he buried
Zu seinen Füßen ein.	in at his feet.

When Cardillac had stabbed his victim and recovered his jewels—der Schmuck ist mein!—he feels 'a peace, a satisfaction in [his] soul, as at no other time' (184). Such is the peace in Völundr's soul, when he has perfected his revenge and calmly recites his deeds to the writhing king.

Though many subtleties in the Norse text could not be rendered in translations, the force of the original poem has still been felt, and emulated, by Hoffmann and García Márquez,⁷⁶ in different ways: the one using its violence, the other its gentleness.

There is perhaps more to be discovered about the relationship of Völundr and Cardillac, which a close examination of the many literary versions of the story after Hoffmann's would reveal. I can here only point to certain motifs that appear in Völundarkviða and in Hindemith's first libretto, by Ferdinand Lion,⁷⁷ but do not appear in Hoffmann. No

⁷⁶ See Vkv Introd 1 and n. 5

⁷⁷ Paul Hindemith, Cardillac.

audience watching the opera will ever forget the image of murderous flight as Cardillac—eine schwarze, maskierte Gestalt—enters the window of the lovers' room to snatch his jewelled treasure and stab the Kavalier to death, and then, his black cloak spreading like wings—Mantel gespreizt wie Flügel—storms back through the window like a bird of prey—Raubvogelhafte Flucht des Mörders—at the end of Act 1. This image of menace from the air dominates the first chorus—'A murderer—hidden—Where?—In the air, with a miraculous mantle—flying, flying in the wind', and becomes even more explicit in the Lady's report (Scene 3) of the murdering thief's procedure: 'He steals the jewel and—like a vulture vanishing into the sky—wie ein Geier, verschwindend in die Höhe—makes off with it'. Hoffmann does not introduce the image of flight for his murderer, though Völundarkviða does. When the King visits Cardillac's smithy, in the opera (Scene 11), the goldsmith is in anguish, fearing to lose his treasures, pacing to and fro like a beast of prey—geht wie ein Raubtier auf und ab. We are reminded of the snarling chained creature of Völundarkviða 16–17; there is no comparable scene in the King's presence in Hoffmann. Among the treasures shown to the King are a ring set with a jewel and a deep-curved bowl: treasures that can be matched in Völundarkviða (6, 25), but not in Hoffmann. All these touches of likeness, taken together, suggest that the parallels between Völundarkviða and Hoffmann's tale of Cardillac had been noted by another German writer, or writers, and that those perceptions were used to increase the tension of Hindemith's drama.

COMMENTARY ON THE TEXT

1/1 Meyjar flugo: only here in the Poetic Edda are maidens expressly said to fly (I exclude the flying troll women, gífr fljúgandi, of Vsp H 44, and the fence-riding witches, túnriðor, of Háv 155, who hover in the air, leika lopti á). The reference to svanfiðrar, 2/6, is the only indication that they are swan maidens (on alvitr, 1/3, 3/9, as a possible replacement for a form of álptir, 'swans', in an older text, see commentary to 1/3 5). It is important to note that the swan maidens of Vkv are not valkyries, although the prose prologue calls them so with great confidence. This misconstruction has led to textual interference in 15/5–8 (see commentary ad loc.) and unfounded interpretations of the poem (see Hauck § 6). That the swan maidens of Vkv should have been identified as valkyries is not surprising, (a) because they are, like the valkyrie heroines Sigrún and Sváva (HH I and II and HHv), lovers who choose their own men (I would suspect that it was indeed on the model of Sigrún and Sváva, or their prototypes, that the poet designed his swan maidens' untraditional behaviour in this respect: see Vkv Introd II A. 1), and (b) because, like valkyries, they are airborne. Valkyries in their human shape are never said to fly. In the Helgi lays the proud baroque image of the sky-trotting horsewomen is paramount: they are the daughters of kings, riding in armour above land and sea, to defend their heroes and their ships from the air (HH I 15, 30; in HHv 26–8 a cavalcade of twenty-seven meyjar passes above valleys and high forests), but neither they nor their horses are winged (in HH I 54/6 sárvitr flugo, 'wound-creatures flew', refers not to Sigrún and her helmed girls, hiálmvitr, descending from the sky, but to the birds of prey alighting on the wounds of the slain, HH I 54/7–8; sár is a common element in raven kennings, but never used for valkyries; Meissner (b), 119–21, 396–8).

As well as the aristocratic mounted valkyrie there is the more sinister winged crow valkyrie, the clone of Freyja in her fiðrhamr, 'feather body-garment' (which she lent to Loki to take him to the chthonic realm of the giants, Þrym 5, 9), who is usually supernatural in origin (see commentary to Ríg 48/1). In one of the oldest OE poems, Exodus 164, the bird of prey is called wonn wælcēasega, 'dark slaughter-picking one', a play on the traditional term wælcyrige (earliest found in OE glossing Bellona, the Furies, etc.; see BT s.v., and Meaney (b), 34–5, nn. 43–7). The two valkyrie images, of horsewoman and carrion bird, meet in the portrayal of Sigrún in HH I and II: she rides through the air to haunt Helgi's battles, but when she embraces his corpse, still living to her, she identifies with the carrion birds, rejoicing 'like Óðinn's hawks' when they scent warm slaughter (HH II 43). Such a character bears little relationship to the swan maidens.

I know of only one instance when a valkyrie also appears as a swan. In a post-Eddic text the valkyrie Kára, sweetheart of one Helgi inn frækni, 'the bold', hovers in swan's guise over Helgi in battle, uttering magical cries that sap the resistance of his enemies (see the 14 c. rimur, Griplur IV, stanzas 24, 43, 58). In tragic burlesque

Helgi wields his sword so high that he severs her leg: she falls to the ground and dies—kraup hun niðr að velli og dó. A lay of Kára Hálfðanardóttir, reincarnation of Sigrún, loved by Helgi Haddingjaskati, reincarnation of Helgi Hundingsbani, is referred to in the prose epilogue to HH II, but she is not there said to be a swan maiden (see U. Brown 65–71). In the Griplur the swan motif has been imposed upon traditions of Kára Hálfðanardóttir, just as in the course of transmission of Vkv the motif of royal valkyrie fathers has been imposed upon the swan maidens (in 11/6, 15/5–8).

If we need a final argument against the identification of the swan maidens in Vkv as valkyries, it must be that valkyries do not leave their lover-husbands. They would regard the behaviour of the swan maidens as quite improper.

1/2 Myrkvið: the place-name of the great barrier forest of ancient Europe is appropriate here (cf. 3/8), as the girls in their migratory flight are crossing the boundary of the southern world—drósr suðrænar—to reach the north (cf. Akv 3/4 and commentary, Lks 42/5).

1/3 alvítr: a rare term, difficult to place philologically. It occurs only (a) in Vkv (as pl. 1/3, 3/9, as sg. 11/7, prologue 7, 9), always of the swan maidens, and (b) in HH II 26/2 of the valkyrie Sigrún. It is commonly identified with the even rarer OE gen. pl. ælwihta in Beowulf 1500: ælwihta eard, 'homeland of otherworld creatures' (referring to Grendel's monster-filled mere). It reappears in late ME (The Towneley Plays 13/202 (l. 132)): two all-wyghtys, 'two unearthly beings' (in a comical spooky scene). This reappearance in a popular context suggests that OE ælwiht, though rare in written texts, had a long colloquial career. Indeed, it seems to me possible that OE ælwiht may have been so rooted in OE superstition that it was 'converted' in early Christian times into a Christian cliché, frequently found in verse, eallwihta, 'of all creatures' (always in gen. pl. after a name for God, 'Lord of all beings', and not restricted to angels and spirits, as Hofmann § 180 suggests; see Grein s.v. ealwihite for varying forms of the prefix). OE eallwihta is the only OE compound in eall-, 'all', where 'all' functions adjectivally rather than adverbially, except (I think) ealneg, 'always', and ealmægen, which is influenced by omnipotentia. There is no Latin word similarly underlying eallwihta. If ON alvítr is a borrowing of OE ælwiht, it may have been the borrowing of a common, not a rare, heathen term. There is no analogous term in OHG or OS records from which alvítr might derive.

The relationship of ON alvítr and OE ælwiht is not linguistically straightforward:

1. The prefix alja-, 'other' (Norw runic aljamarkin, 'one from another region', cf. AEW s.v.; Gothic aljakuns, 'of foreign ancestry'), commonly shows i/j-mutation (ON elligar, 'otherwise', OE elþið, 'foreign people'). Were the ON alvítr a native formation, rather than a borrowing from OE, the lack of j-mutation would be attributable to shortening of alja*- to ali*- and regular lack of i-mutation in a short syllable (cf. Harjawaldar* > Hariwaldar* > Haraldr; Noreen § 69, 66. 2). In OE, forms both with and without i-mutation occur: elþið beside ælpēð, ælwihta etc.: i-mutation sometimes failed to take place owing to early syncopation in compound words (Campbell (a) § 204 (1)). The ON alvítr is readily explicable as a borrowing of an OE form which lacks i-mutation (as do both occurrences of the English word, ælwihta and all-wyghtys).

2. The regular ON equivalent of OE wiht (an i-stem fluctuating between fem. and neut. forms; Campbell (a) § 609) is véttir, vættir (with assimilation of ht to tt, lengthening and lowering of i). According to Noreen § 110. 3, lowering of i to é/æ would be prevented when i or u followed: a stem vít- might therefore arise in the nom., acc. sg. and pl. in the paradigm of the fem. i-stems to which véttir/vættir commonly conforms (cf. OHG uuhtir, 'animalia'), before levelling of the stem-vowel from unmutated cases occurred (Noreen §§ 67, 392). The forms Noreen frequently cites, vít(t)r, víttr, do not, however, occur as such, but can be traced in compounds (a) as -vitr in alvitr, fólkvitr, hjálmvitr, sárvitr (see below), and (b) as -vitna gen. pl. in hvatvitna, 'anything whatever', hvarvitna, 'everywhere' (with short vowel because of position; Noreen § 65; Seip 153; Vigfússon s.v. hvat-vetna, -vitna. The adv. eyvit, 'not at all', might here be included, Vigfússon s.v.). On the simplification of tt to t before a consonant see Noreen §§ 267, 284.

3. Two of the forms in -vitr occur as sg.: alvitr, Vkv 10/7, HH II 26/2; fólkvitr, Fáf 43/2. Three occur as pl.: alvitr, Vkv 1/3, 3/9; hjálmvitr, sárvitr, HH I 54/2, 6. To what declension can -vitr belong? The nom. sg. form in -r relates -vitr to the fem. i-declension. Because of levelling with the fem. ō-stems only a few fem. nom. sg. forms in -r remain (e.g. brúðr, nauðr, vættir; Noreen § 390. 1). The nom. pl. form in -r relates -vitr to the consonant-stem declension (cf. pl. merkr, nætr < nættir*; Noreen notes that the link of -vitr with the consonant-stems is exceptional, §§ 390. 1, 416). This declension originally also had nom. fem. sg. in -r (as in masc. fótr), but, because of levelling, only a few instances remain: (a) where the stem ends in a vowel (e.g. kýr, sýr, ær, showing r-mutation), and (b) ONorw elþtr, 'swan' (OIcel qlpt), showing i-mutation in nom. sg. not characteristic of consonant-stems, which Noreen § 416. 1 relates to jō-stem influence; no nom. pl. elþtr* is recorded.

4. It is unlikely that the stem-vowel of -vitr is short, or has been shortened (as represented in many editions). All consonant-stems have a long root syllable; -vitr would only have been associated with that declension if i were long. In the Eddic compounds -vitr appears to have been a significant formative element, always referring to a feminine being with a supernatural side to her. -vitr must, therefore, have been recognized as a variant of véttir/vættir, 'being (of supernatural or unnatural powers)'; cf. HHv 27/4–5: Var sú (sc. the valkyrie Sváva) ein vættir, / er barg þóðlings skipom? 'Was it a single (mysterious) being, who saved the prince's ships?'; also pl. vættir, 'supernatural beings (kindly or hostile)', landvættir, 'land-guarding spirits', óvættir, 'evil spirits'; AR § 181; LP s.vv. I would suppose that the oldest use of -vitr in ON (in our extant texts) is in alvitr and that this was the basis of the three coinages hjálm-, sár-, fólkvitr.

It is unlikely, as Hofmann § 163 suggests, that the connection between véttir/vættir and -vitr (sic) was no longer recognized because -vitr took its short vowel from OE wiht. Norse loanwords in OE show that the relationship between ON (-ht-* >) -tt and OE -ht- was perfectly well understood, as well as the different length of the preceding vowel (e.g. sáttir, OE saht, Orm sahht, etc.; Noreen § 267). In the close understanding between the two languages there is no reason to think that OE wiht might have been misconstrued and given a form in ON that did not render the OE sense.

5. Attempts have been made to relate alvitr to the Gmc term for 'swan', e.g. OE ælbitu, ȝfletu, OHG albiz, elpiz, ON elptr, ǫlpt (based on the root alb-*, 'white'; see AEW s.v. alvitr; Wadstein 157, 175). It is conceivable that at some stage in this widely travelled poem's history, there may have been confusion of the two terms in Gmc dialects where derivatives of both alwiht* and albiz* occurred. Formally they can never have been identical, though possibly close enough to give rise to verbal play on the senses 'otherworld being' and 'swan' (especially given the unique declensional similarity between alvitr and elptr). There is no evidence that such verbal play existed for the poet of the extant Vkv.

The linguistic complexities that arise in any attempt to identify the origins of alvitr suggest that in Vkv it derives from an adaptation of a well-understood OE term for 'otherworld being', and that it was assimilated into Norse before the workings of analogy had removed such forms as al-, 'other-', and vítt-, 'being', from the ON oral vocabulary. Neither al- nor vítt- had any future in the later Norse language, though it has occurred to me that the prefix al-, 'alien', 'otherworld', is perhaps to be seen in the 9 c. skaldic algífris, Ragnǫr 9/8 (? 'otherworld troll', of the wolf Fenrir, brother of Hel).

ungar: so also 3/9. MS. unga is unacceptable as fem. pl. nom., weak or strong; see commentary to 11/5–8.

1/4 orlǫg drýgia: also 3/10; in ON texts orlǫg always signifies 'fate', 'fated acts' (cf. Lks 25); drýgia, 'to carry out, sustain, live through, endure' is widely used in relation to action, manner of life, obligation, hardship, but never, except in Vkv, is it recorded in relation to 'fate'. In OE texts, however, drēogan is twice found in association with orleg, where the sense of 'fate' is implied: (a) in The Judgement Day I 29 the sinner ā to caldre / orleg drēogeð, 'will forever endure his fate, destined tribulation (in hell)', and (b) in Solomon and Saturn 375–6 a mother identifies with the sufferings of her son, drēogeð / his earfoðu / orlegstunde, 'lives through his hardships in the fated time' (for the syntax cf. Christ 1410). That there was also in OE an idiom similar to orleg drēogan, namely myrd drēogan*, is suggested by the emergence of ME to dreȝe (one's) myrdes (a single instance) and the later, more frequently recorded English and Scottish proverbial phrase to dree one's weird (see OED s.v. dree v. 2 (c); EDD s.v. dree v. 2 (2); MED s.v. drien v. (2) 3 (a), c. 1400). Unassociated with drēogan, OE orleg with the sense 'fate' occurs only once, in Daniel 745: the prophet tells Belshazzar ic . . . orleg secge, / worda gerȳnu, / þā þū wendan ne miht, 'I tell your fate, the hidden meaning of the words (on the wall), which you cannot alter'. Vkv orlǫg drýgia and OE orleg drēogan no doubt go back to a common Gmc idiom, though preserved in these rare instances with a startling difference of imagination: the OE idiom bears the weight of Christian moralizing, 'fate' being the result of sin, or a synonym for life's wretchedness; in Vkv the phrase also has a moral implication, since the swan maidens are bound to obey the law of their nature, their orlǫg, yet they rejoice in the freedom that their orlǫg compels them to: meyjar fjǫstoz (3/7). The 'need'—nauðr—to go, when their migratory nature asserts its power over them, and the 'constraint'—nauðr—of domestic confinement that makes them rejoice to leave it, are perfectly covered by the single word as the cause of their departure—nauðr um skilði (3/6).

In stanza 15, after Vǫlundr's praise of the precious household of brothers, there follow four lines (which I think are interpolated) citing the names of the three wives as daughters of a king and an emperor, whose names belong to the Gmc heroic-historical world. To this world the great valkyries belong—Brynhildr and the brides of Helgi—and for this reason the interpolator has given the three swan wives noble paternity: to give them at least one valkyrie characteristic within the text of the poem (see Vkv Introd iv. A). The author of the prologue has emphasized this royal blood, interpreted orlǫg drýgia as if orlǫg implied 'battle', and called the swan maidens valkyries: their escape-flight is their response to the lure of slaughter (Þá flugo þær at vitia víga). But nowhere in ON does orlǫg signify 'battle', and drýgia is never used of carrying on battle (the instance cited in LP s.v. § 2 d[rýgia] eggja dolg, 'pursue the conflict of blades' is an emended text; see Svarfðæla Saga 177).

In OE orlæg, orleg, 'fate', and orlege, 'battle', could be confused (see Crozier 8), especially in compounds (e.g. orleghwil, Beowulf 2427). But drēogan is only once recorded of pursuing combat, and there the term for combat is not orleg, but gewinn (the wrestling with Grendel, Beowulf 789). There would seem to be no instance in OE or ON of an idiom 'to pursue battle' using drýgia/drēogan with orlǫg or orlygi / orleg or orlege. Neckel proposed an archaic connection between drýgia and orlygi on the basis of the warrior kenning orlygis draugr (Ragnǫr 8/8 only), where draugr, if etymologically related to drýgia, might signify 'sustainer, wager (of battle)' (Neckel (c), 189–90; cf. JH Vkv 55–6). The uncertainty of the meaning and etymology of draugr undermines the usefulness of this suggestion (see the valuable critique of Neckel by Crozier 1–12).

Whatever valkyrie motifs other Norse poets may have attached to tales of swan maidens, it is clear that the poet of Vkv did not wish to associate them with battles. The fated compulsions of his swan maidens are rooted in domestic, not martial instincts.

1/5 á sævar strönd: in analogues the water on which the swan maidens alight is commonly a lake or pond, rather than a sea-shore, and I have translated accordingly; see commentary to 17/10 and Hatto 269–74.

1/7 drósir: 'fine gentlewomen', an old poetic heiti (ironically used by Eilífr Goðrúnarson for 'giantess': Hrimnis drós, Þórsdr 17), that is found in later ON prose (e.g. Alexanders Saga 70, 152, for imposing allegorical figures: Ambitio, Avaritia, Superbia) and survives in Nynorsk for 'stately (or portly) ladies' (Torp s.v. drós, Hellevik s.v. drós). SnE 189, drósir heita þær, er kyrrlátar eru, 'women of peaceful temperament are called drósir', accords well with the etymology commonly proposed for drós, relating it to terms implying slowness, leisureliness, heaviness (see Íslensk orðsifjabók s.v. for valuable exemplification; also AEW s.v., which adds ModE drowsy). If drósir in Vkv belongs to this semantic field, the term is well chosen for the leisured stateliness of swans. It is the only heiti for 'woman' in Vkv.

1/8 dýrt lín spunno: I interpret lín as a pointed reference to the bridal veil (cf. Ríg 41/4) rather than to linen clothing in general. The three women spinning, fulfilling their fate, form a tableau of fate at work (by the poet's design; cf. AR § 191).

2/2, 5, 10 Egil... Slagfinn... Vplundar: see Vkv Introd IV. A; Index of Personal Names.

2/2 veria: cf. varði, 2/9. It is noticeable that the poet does not mention the embracing arms of the swan maidens (cf. Háv 163/8: mik armi verr, '(she who) enfolds me in her arm'); that would have confused the swan image.

2/3 fira: on firar and its shifting range of reference see commentary to Vsp 1/7. The poet is holding in suspense the changing image of swan maiden-amorous girl. Therefore I have not translated mær fira as 'maiden of mankind', but attempted to render the wider sense of firar: of the living beings in the world, she is one that is young and beautiful, whether swan or girl.

2/5-6 Qnnur — dró: these two sentences in the MS., 'the second was Svanhvít, / she plied/wore swan's wings', break the system of the rest of the stanza. In the case of the first and the third swan maidens, the man's name is given, not the girl's, and each girl is depicted embracing her chosen man. I suggest that there are two scribal errors in line 5, which, when rectified, restore the system: (a) MS. 'v^{ar}' is a corruption of MS. 'v', by confusion or blurring of the superscript sign; (b) MS. 'svan hvít' is a scribal substitute (drawn from 5/4) for an illegible Slagfinn. In 2/10 the name Vplundar is miswritten 'onondar' in the MS. An exemplar has probably been worn or blotted where these two names occurred. As the extant MS. shows (fol. 35, lines 22-4), in the scribe's exemplar the two names could have been nearly one above the other.

The reading um Slagfinn / svanfiðrar dró, 'drew round Slagfiðr her swan's wings', is supported by the figurative phrase draga fjðr um, 'to conceal' (literally 'to draw a wing over'; cf. Morkinskinna 309: Sigurðr . . . hafði áðr tekit tal við lenda menn, at ekki mundi þurfa lengr at draga fjðr um sköpruligt konungs erindi. . . 'þarf nú ekki lengr yfir þessu at hylma', 'Sigurðr had already argued with the landed men, that there was no need to draw a wing any longer over the king's noble purpose. . . "there is no need any longer to conceal it"; Fritzner s.v. fjðr § 1. For fjðr sg., 'wing', cf. Haustl 12: leikblaðs reginn fjaðrar, 'lord of the wing's soaring leaf' (my rendering) i.e. 'eagle'). In the Dream of Óengus, Óengus embraces his betrothed in her swan form (112; see Vkv Introd II. A. 1).

It should be noted that the MS. reading Svanhvít . . . svanfiðrar dró is idiomatically unsatisfactory. Draga is not elsewhere used of 'plying' wings (cf. draga árar, 'to ply oars'), and a sense 'wore' would be borrowed from German usage (see Fritzner s.v. draga § 17). Draga yfir/um is however idiomatically used in Norse for drawing on clothing or making a covering (cf. Egil (1856) 134: hann hafði dregit hopt síðan yfir hjálm, 'he had drawn a long hood over his helmet').

2/8 þeira systir: according to 15/5-8 only two of the wives were born sisters. In 2/8 systir might refer to the 'sorority' of friendship of the three (cf. Hyndl 1/2-3: mín vína, / Hyndla systir, 'my friend, Hyndla my sister', in exaggerated cordiality; HH II 7/3-4: gögl. . . Gunnar systra, 'the goslings of Guðr's sisters', i.e. the ravens of the valkyries; in Helr 6/3 the 'eight sisters' are no doubt valkyrie sworn-sisters, but the context is too obscure for us to be certain). In Vkv, however, I think it more probable that the three swan sisters were designed to be real sisters by the poet of this stanza, to match the three real brothers, and make the family net more tightly knit. On the discrepancy with 15/5-8 see Vkv Introd IV. A.

2/9 hvítan: on the elvish brightness of Vplundr see Vkv Introd II. C.

2/10 háls: two OE conventional terms for 'wife', 'consort' refer to the (embracing of the) neck: healsgebedda, 'neck-embracing companion of the bed', Beowulf 63; healsmægeð, 'neck-embracing girl', Genesis 2155.

3/2 siau vetr: DH note the similar time scheme in the MHG Kudrun: the heroine is enslaved in exile for seven years (siben jâr bevollen / leit si in vremeden rîchen / die grôzen arbeite, 1021, dusting the benches with her hair, 1019), until the ninth year when Hartmuot returns to wed her (1022; though this is not what she wants).

3/6 nauðr, 'oppressive, unavoidable necessity', 'coercion', 'lack of freedom', 'slavery' see Fritzner s.v. nauð eller nauðr §§ 2, 3; Norwegian and Icelandic Runic Poems 8 (Dickins 26, 30, Skjald B II. 249); also commentary to 1/4, 12/6).

3/8 á myrkvan við: while reference back to Myrkvið, 1/2, is clearly intended here, the shift from the place-name to the descriptive phrase is contextually fine: the girls see in the dark edge of forest round them (cf. ór holti, 16/8) the sign of the boundary they long to cross. Myrkvið 1/2 is geographical, á myrkvan við is scenic. Though the variation may be an oral 'accident', this is no good reason for levelling the two terms (as SG suggest). For other narrative adaptations of Myrkviðr see Ríg 38/2 and commentary, and Oddr 25/3 (with echoes of Akv 1, 3).

4/2 veðreygr: in ON only in Vkv. Magnússon, 28-9, notes three senses of veðreygr in Modlcel, (a) 'with a discerning eye for weather or wind', (b) 'with eyes wind-bitten, smarting from the weather', (c) 'with eyes glancing warily from side to side' (as in nervous horses; veðr here being figurative). All three senses could be relevant in Vkv. Cf. the ModE idiom 'keeping a weather-eye open', i.e. watching which way the wind blows (figuratively), bringing opportunity or danger; OED s.v. weather sb. 8; Fritzner s.v. veðr § 1.

skyti: here the quasi-gnomic singular is designed for refrain-like repetition in 10/1-2. It might well be, also, that brothers in real life would go as lone hunters, to increase their range of luck. Now each comes homing back as the clouds gather. To insert into the text here lines 3-4 of stanza 10, so that skyti now refers only to Vplundr's return (as SG, JH Vkv suggest), would destroy the poet's construction. He has not mentioned Vplundr in this stanza because his reaction to the wife-deserted house is different from that of his brothers: his 'difference' is seen with full force at the end of the next stanza (5/5-6), in the wake of their departure.

5/1 skreið, 'glided' on snowshoes or skis; skriða is idiomatic for the motion of snakes, skis, ships. In the prologue the three brothers are said to be Lapps (see Vkv Introd III. c): the Lapps were proverbial for the vast distances they rapidly covered on skis (cf. 10/3-4: líðandi/um langan veg; also the comprehensive gnomic terms of outlawry in the Trygðamál, Grágás I. 206: 'outlawed as far as . . . earth grows, . . . Lapp skis (Fiðr skriðr), . . . falcon flies'. Procopius VI. xv. 16 names the Lapps as Σκριθίφινοι).

That the two brothers leave on skis, suggests that the girls have flown as winter comes.

5/2, 4 Qlruín, . . . Svanhvít: on these names see Vkv Introd IV. A; Index of Personal Names.

5/6 Úlfðplom: as JH Vkv notes, Vplundr would alliterate with Úlfðplom before assimilation of initial v-, as the names would also in OE. The place-name is designed to fit his personality in this legend (cf. 16, 17) and emphasize his characteristic, outlaw-like isolation (see Vkv Introd II. B). For Ulvedalen as a farm name in Norway see Rygh I. 312, XII. 280.

6/1-6 Here there are three substantial uncertainties: (a) 6/2 fastan, (b) 6/4 lindbauga, (c) 6/6 hánom koma gerði. The narrative facts, however, seem clear: (a) Vplundr is forging jewellery, in which gold is hammered round a precious stone, (b) he is making closed rings, which could be strung upon a bast cord, as in 8/5-6, (c) he is doing this while he waits for his wife to return.

The first uncertainty I would determine as simply as possible, taking fastan as masc. acc. adj. qualifying gim, 'jewel', (a nonce loanword from OE gim masc.; see Vkv Introd III. A. 3). The gem could be described as fastr (i) because it was tightly held by the gold hammered round it (cf. Elene 264-5: sincgim locen . . . hlāfordes gifu, 'treasure-gem closed in (with gold) . . . a lord's gift'), and/or (ii) because it was made firm by resin or cement (as are garnets in cloisonné work, cf. Arrhenius ch. 6). There is no evidence to support a reading fástan as superlative of -fár (OE fāh, OHG fēh) 'brightly coloured', 'stained'. There is no certain instance of the uncompounded positive adj. fár in ON (cf. Skm 23/2), and no recorded instance of the superlative in any Gmc language (cf. Gothic filu-faihs 'very variegated', Feist s.v.). The accent in MS. 'fastan' is not necessarily significant, cf. 'liosár', 6/5. A reading fastan adv., 'hard', 'energetically', would have no parallel, and would be unfitting for the making of a delicate ring.

For lindbauga hap. leg. I choose an interpretation that again relates to the smith's procedure: he now closes the ring's metal circle to hang on the cord. So lindbauga would mean 'linden-rings', 'rings for the linden(-bast) cord' (cf. 8/5-6). Lind for 'linden-bast' is, however, not elsewhere recorded in ON, though lindi, 'belt', is thought to be so called from the plaited linden-bast of which it was made (AEW s.v. lindi 1; note also English dialect linder, 'to tie up', linderins, 'ropes', EDD s.vv.). Emendation to linnbauga, 'snake-rings', (otherwise unattested) is no improvement on retaining lindbauga: linnr is not elsewhere used descriptively in a ring kenning (e.g. 'ring with a snake depicted on it' or 'ring like a snake'), but only as a substitute for baugr itself (so armlinnr is 'snake of the arm', i.e. 'bracelet'). DH (284) effectively (I think) dismiss the interpretation of 6/3-4 by which lukði would refer to the enclosing of the rings on or by the bast cord (see SG), pointing out that lykia in this sense does not occur elsewhere, to their knowledge, and that only the interpretation 'to close the circle of the ring itself' is valid (see Fritzner s.v. lykja).

In 6/6 the wording of the MS. is unidiomatic. JH Vkv suggests reading hón um for MS. 'h^{an}ð' (which only adds another pleonasm to the line, cf. koma gerði). One might supply fyr (MS. 'f^y') before hanom, as possible haplography after ef: 'if, for his sake, she might come'. In some of the swan maiden tales the wife comes back, though for her children rather than her husband (Hatto 270, 272). I have read 6/5-6 as two extended lines, expressing the longeur of Vplundr's waiting (cf. the sleepless length of 19/1). They cannot be read as four lines as they stand, but they might be a patchwork based on four badly remembered, or barely legible, lines.

7/1 spyrri: in the narrative stanzas the present tense occurs only here and in [16/1], 30/1.

Níðuðr: see Index of Personal Names.

7/2 Niára: the name and location of this people have not been identified. The author of the prose prologue places Níðuðr in Sweden. JH Vkv suggests that he may have identified the name Niarar (Niárar is metrically preferable) with a district in Sweden, ON Næriki (modern Närke), but etymologically there can be no connection (see the excellent note in SG).

7/6 Negldar vóro brynior: 'nailed corslets', i.e. most probably chain mail corslets with rivets or 'nails' fastening together all or some of the chain-rings; Shetelig and Falk note (403-4) of one mailcoat from a Danish bog that 'all the rings were riveted with bronze, which must have given the corslet a handsome appearance' (prominent, perhaps, in moonlight). Alternatively negldar might refer to nailed-on metal plaques or 'scales' upon leathern corslets: a style characteristic of nomadic warriors of the steppes, such as the Sarmatians (used in Europe as Roman troops until the 5 c.; see Entre Asie et Europe, esp. 118-24 and illustrations 3, 26, 34, 35, 36, 37. DH have a valuable note).

7/7-8 skildir — mána: compare the baleful implications of the moon shining upon armed enemies in Finnesbög 7-10.

skarða, 'cut away', 'diminished', i.e. waning, not (as Vigfússon says) crescent.

8/2-4 at salar gaffli — endlangan sal: I take this to mean that the horsemen dismounted and entered by the door in the gable end of the house and from there — þaðan — walked in down the length of the building. The alternatives of DH, SG hardly seem justified.

8/7 allra: though sg. adverbial gen. alls, 'in all', is common, pl. allra in the same sense is not (cf. LP s.v. allr § 3); perhaps the construction is to be read: 'rings on the rope, the seven hundred—i.e. the total number—of all that the man owned' (see SG).

9/3 einn: I assume that they chose to steal the loveliest ring, meant for his wife, perhaps the only one set with a jewel (cf. 6/1–2; Vkv Introd II. J).

10/5–6 Gekk — steikia: the MS. presents a clumsy text which barely makes sense. It is improved if we supply a word before hold, so that brúnni and bero belong to the same metrical phrase, having an adverbial, rather than possessive sense: 'flesh on, from, the brown she-bear' (cf. Sigs 32/5–6: sæir bræðr þínom / blóðugt sár, 'should see on your brother a bleeding wound'; DH). To give alliteration and suggest the freshness of newly killed meat I supply biart, 'bright', 'shining'; cf. Fáf 32/7–8, where the newly excised heart of Fáfnir is called fiðrsega fránan, 'gleaming life-clot'. The bleeding track of wounds is described in terms of 'brightness' by Sigvatr (Erfi-drápa 8: í hjarta blóðrøst, 'in the bright [implying also 'holy'] course of blood'), and by Bragi (Ragnr 6, bláserkjar birkis . . . fagrøgtu, 'shining track of the sword, the corselet's birch').

10/7 Ár: MS. hár does not alliterate or provide the required adverb. For ár, 'promptly' (a sense developed perhaps from ár, 'early in the day', cf. Skv 27/2) there are few parallels, cf. Gísl 105 v. 32/3–4: ár þótt eigi værak / andaðr, 'though I did not die at once, as soon as I might have' (the interpretation of ár as 'swiftly' in Hofgarða-Refr 2: 1/8, Skjald B I. 295, is not accepted in Hkr II. 382 v. 153).

10/10 fyr Vplundi: both 'for' him and 'before' him, as he tends it and cooks. As a smith he is master of fire.

11/1 Sat á berfialli: I take this to be a picturesque insight into a Lappish huntsman's life, as he sits on the warm fur-skin of one of the bears he has killed. That there might be behind the image some reminiscence or allusion relating to the shamanic practice of sitting on a hide or cloth before shamanizing, is not unlikely (see Tolley (a), 455), but the poet does not seem to imply any shamanic element in Vplundr's behaviour here. The counting of the rings has no divinatory purpose—it simply shows that one ring is missing. This makes Vplundr dream and sleep, waiting for his wife to come to him. I think we could say that the poet may have had in mind images of shamanic practices, which he deliberately used for his own naturalistic purposes in the portrayal of a deserted husband: the intense willing for the return of the loved wife, in the fingering and counting of her rings, the sharp—though mistaken—intuition of her presence, the heavy, trance-like sleep and the grievous awakening (shamanic analogies that Tolley notes, (a), 455–6).

11/3 álfa lióði: see Vkv Introd II. C. Lióði occurs nowhere else in ON. There are two possible interpretations:

1. 'Man belonging to a certain people', a regular formation based on ON ljóðr, 'people' (as ON landi, 'fellow countryman', is based on land, and as OE lēoda, 'compatriot', is based on lēod fem., 'people'). If lióði were a Norse equivalent, or borrowing, of OE lēoda, Vplundr would be 'compatriot of elves' (cf. JH Vkv 62).

I am not very happy with this interpretation, because ljóðr is a quite rare poetic word found only in the heiti following Skáldskaparmál: Ljóðr heitir landfólk eða ljóðr (SnE 188), and in the phrase ljóða læ, 'peoples' treachery', in a verse of Þórðr Kolbeinsson (Skjald B I. 202; Hkr I. 300, vísa 144), and in three poetic compounds (a) ljóðfrømuðr, 'advancer of his people' (Eiríkr blóðøx) Arinbjarnarkviða 4, (b) ljóðmegir, 'men of his people' (Hákon's soldiers), Hákonarmál 4, (c) ljóðheimar, 'realms of men', Gróug 2. (In prose ljóðbiskup is a borrowing from OE lēodbisceop; Fritzner s.v.). Nor are elves in any record I know associated with the term 'people' (ljóðr, lēod) in ON or OE, but rather with 'kin' (cf. Fáf 13: nornir. . . álfkungar, 'norns of elvish race'; OE Leechdoms II. 344. 7: Wyrce sealfre wið ælfcynne, 'make an ointment to protect from the elf-race').

2. 'Foremost man', 'leader', 'prince', an adaptation in ON philological terms of the OE poetic usage of lēod masc., 'compatriot', to signify 'prince' when followed by the name of a people in gen. pl. (Grein s.v. lēod; Klaeber, 129, would reject the sense 'prince' here). While in prose OE lēod masc. and its variants lēoda, gelēod are rare in the sg. (occurring mainly in laws and compounds, e.g. landlēod; cf. BT and Suppl. s.vv.), in poetry OE lēod masc. sg. with a defining gen. pl. is quite frequent and is carried on from pre-Christian idiom into Christian texts. Lēod is nine times used of Beowulf as leader of Geats, and once directly equated with 'king': Hiorogār cýning, / lēod Scýldinga (Beowulf 2158–9). In Genesis 2163–4 Abraham is se hálga. . . / Ebræa lēod, 'holy chief of the Hebrews'. If OE verses on Weland were known to a Norse poet (see Vkv Introd III. A. 3) they could have contained a phrase ælfa lēod*.

That a term lióði 'compatriot' should have been specially formed from a rare Norse stem or borrowed (in the form lēoda) from an OE legal term simply in order to define Vplundr as an elf, seems less probable than that a term lióði, 'prince', should have been borrowed from OE as a traditional title for the foremost member of a gens, a way of marking Vplundr's uncanny distinction (later emphasized in vísi álfa 14/4, 32/2).

11/5–8 Hugði — komin: on Hlǫðvés dóttir see Vkv Introd IV. A. Are we to suppose that Vplundr thinks that his wife is affectionately teasing him, taking the ring to tell him she is there, and then hiding (see Vkv Introd I ad loc.), until he seeks her? Yet—as when she first left—he makes no move to seek her.

alvítr unga: a repetition of alvítr unga (MS.) 1/3, 3/9, in which unga can be accepted as weak fem. nom. sg. (though ung would be expected with a common noun).

12/4 vílialaus: cf. 31/2 and Vkv Introd IV. D. Translation cannot capture the double sense of víli-, 'joy', 'will'.

12/6 hofgar nauðir: the abstract term nauðr, 'necessity', 'oppression' (cf. 3/6 and commentary), is twice recorded in the pl. of physical constraints, accompanied by adjectives that have physical connotations: here, and in Sigrdr 1/4: splvar nauðir, 'pale [i.e. colourless iron; cf. splvir oddar, 'pale spear-points', HH I 53/3] bonds', where the reference must be primarily to the chain-mail—brýnio 1/1—that Sigurðr has cut away—feldi af 1/3—from Sigrdrifa. Symbolically the chain-mail represents the warrior life which is now oppressive to her (and not the sleep of oblivion—svefni, 1/2—as Stephens, 372, suggests), because her body now wishes to be wedded: the fearless man has come (it is a Viking adaptation of the ‘Loathly Bride’ folk-tale). But the chain-mail is still real. We must reckon with the poets’ chosen use of naudir in a concrete sense—‘chains’—precisely because the abstract connotations of the term accompany it and give it wider echoes. In both ON and OE the pl. forms naudir, nēde (niede, nýde) are used with abstract sense (‘difficult straits’, ‘tyranny’, ‘servitude’; cf. OE poetic compounds e.g. þēownýdum, þrēanýdum; see Grein s.vv.). Like naudir, OE pl. nēde is also clearly used of chains in Andreas 1377–8, when Satan is reminded that God bound him in niedum iū / gefæst-node, / fyrnum clommum, ‘in fetters fastened long ago, in ancient chains’ (cf. also Andreas 102: on nearonēdum, ‘in cramping constraints’, which (however abstractly we translate them) must refer to physical bonds, because nearonēdum is parallel with leoðobendum, ‘bonds upon the limbs’, two lines above, and several times it is emphasized that Matthew and his followers have been tied up, e.g. 48, 130, 184; cf. Stephens 372). Nedoma (b), 137–8, does not press his analysis fully home. See Appendix and Vkv Introd III. A. 3.

13/2–3 þeir — síma: the problem here seems insoluble. Our first impression is that Völundr is asking who has placed rope (síma) on him and bound him, and that we must try to fit the incomprehensible besti byr into this framework. Völundr, however, has not been bound by rope, but by iron (binda can be used of fetters, cf. Heilagra Manna Sögur I. 227/8: Martinus . . . batt . . . iárfesti offót sér, ‘Martinus bound an iron chain round his foot’; síma (neut.) and sími (masc.) are only used of rope, twine, cf. Hárb 18: konor . . . ór sandi / síma undo, ‘women twisted rope out of sand’). Could besti and síma (a) conceal a reference to the bast rope with its rings, or (b) be a corruption of (a form of) bezta gorsími*, ‘(my) best treasure’, with reference to the theft of his jewelled ring (see commentary to 26/3)? Yet how can any reference to the ring fit the phrase á lpgðo, ‘placed on’, when ‘took off’ would be expected? Were a reference to bast-bound rings the solution to 13/3 we would need more lines to complete it. In Deor the phrase on legde has Weland’s chains, nēde, as its object. The Norse poet refers to this chaining in 12/5–8 and 13/4; would he do so also in 13/2–3? Alternatively, could á lpgðo refer to the placing of a spell of drowsiness upon Völundr (or could it be haplography for á lpg lpgðo, ‘placed spells (upon me)’? cf. Fritzner s.v. álag § 6, Vigfússon s.v. álag II; also in Hrólfr 42). Though Völundr’s falling asleep is depicted as wholly natural—with weariness, warmth, food, and day-dreams—it might have seemed malevolent magic to him when he awoke. Even so, 13/3 remains unintelligible.

SG would emend 13/3 to besting síma, ‘(who put) rope on the bear’ (i.e. ‘bast-bound one’), a metaphorical expression of Völundr’s capture, picturing him as a tied bear. Bestingr occurs (a) in a pula of bjarnar heiti, Skjald B I. 670; (b) as part of a snake kenning gljúfrs bestingr in a lausavísa of 1232, in which the sense ‘bear’ for bestingr is not accepted by modern editors, Sturl (a) I. 358, 598, (b) I. 344; cf. Meissner (b), 113 d.

14/3–6 Níðaðr does not answer Völundr’s question directly, but gaily counters with one of his own, revealing himself with pointed irony in ‘our wealth’, ‘our land’, 14/5, 9.

14/7–10 Gull — Rínar: I take Níðaðr’s tone to be jocular, as he draws extravagant comparisons between Völundr’s gold—so miraculously discovered in his own kingdom—and the legendary hoards that Sigurðr the dragon-slayer rode away with on Grani’s back and the Niflung brothers sank in the Rhine (see Fáf, with its narrative prose setting, and Akv 17, 27).

15/1–4 Man ek — vórom: Völundr would seem to be talking aside, to himself, comparing Níðaðr’s mercenary concept of riches with his own. Note his other soliloquies, 18, 28/5–8 – 29/1–4.

mæti: Völundr must surely be speaking metaphorically here, referring to the rich contentment of the three couples in their enclosed life (cf. Gísli’s nostalgic clinging to the hermetic family: Saman er bræðra eign best at líta, ‘Brothers’ lands look best together’, Gísl 34). Other interpretations suggested for mæti (DH, SG, JH Vkv) divert attention from the theme of the poem.

15/5–8 Hlaðguðr — dóttir: I have taken these lines to be intrusive, as I do not see any evidence that the poet of stanzas 1 to 3 wished his swan maidens to have human connections, such as valkyries have in ON heroic verse (see commentary to 1/3 alvitr; Vkv Introd IV. A; Index of Personal Names. For an attempt to parallel the awkward singular borin var see DH).

kunn: I interpret this to fit the context of high birth, and therefore of fame. If allusion is to Qlrun’s great (? magical) knowledge, the reference might be to the legend of her association with Egill, of which we no longer know the details.

16/1–2 Úti — Níðaðar: I have inserted lines 30/1–2 to supply stage directions for the next scene. It is not necessary to suppose that some narrative stanza has been lost before the queen’s appearance. Stanza 16 implies that the scene has moved to the king’s house, with the queen standing at the entrance, then pacing down the long hall to look more closely at the prisoner brought in from the wilds (see Vkv Introd IV. B).

16/6 stilti, ‘controlled’; she speaks under her breath, so that he shall not hear.

16/7 hýrr, ‘sociable’, ‘pleasant’, used of docile beasts and obliging prayer-granting saints; etymologically related to hjú, ‘household’, hjón, ‘wedded pair’, and Lat civis (see AEW s.vv.). In OE unhēore, ‘not pleasant’, is used of monstrous, hostile beings (such as Grendel’s mother, wif unhýre, Beowulf 2120).

16/8 ór holti: a smith needed to live near a wood to make charcoal for his furnace (cf. Þiðrek I. 232, ch. 164).

Prose 16 – 17 The prose is not needed, since it only anticipates the queen’s statements in 17/1–4. Stanzas 16 and 17 should be read consecutively.

17/1 teygjaz: two senses of teygja (Fritzner s.v. §§ 1, 2) are used here: (a) literal, 'to stretch out' (limbs, neck, dough: teygja brauð), reflexive here 'stretch themselves'; (b) figurative, 'to lure out', 'to tempt' (cf. Sigrdr 32/4: mey þú teygjat, 'do not entice a girl'), passive here 'are tempted'. The queen sarcastically notes that he is so tantalized by the sight of his treasures in others' hands that his teeth—the only part of his body free to attack—are straining forward to snap and bite to get his own precious work back. His snarling teeth confirm for her his beast-like savagery, the impossibility of making him 'domesticated'—hyrr (see also JH Vkv). There is no reason to suppose a distinct verb teygja, 'to display' (his teeth), which occurs nowhere else in ON (SG).

17/2 er hánom er tét sverð: lit. 'when before him, in his sight, presence, the sword is displayed'. As DH note, the sword is not being expressly shown to him, rather 'wenn er zufällig das Schwert sieht' is intended.

17/3 Bǫðvildar: see Index of Personal Names.

17/5–6 Ámon — frána: the rare adj. ámonr/ámunr (see Noreen § 61. 1) is probably to be related to vb. muna, 'to remember, call to mind' (as áþekkr, 'recognizable as', 'similar to', is related to vb. þekkja, 'to recognize'; cf. Vsp 34/4). A sense 'reminding by similarity' fits also the only other ON poetic instance, in HH II 11/5–8, when Helgi cross-questions Sigrún on her confident identification of himself and his men: margir ro hvassir / hildings synir / ok ámunir / ossom niðiom, 'there are many brave prince's sons who could be mistaken for our kin' (cf. AEW s.v. ámunr and the articles of Bugge and Falk there cited).

The queen's comparison of Völundr's eyes to 'the glittering serpent' is commonly understood as a comparison of his eyes to the eyes of the serpent (DH, SG, JH Vkv). Yet her words, by not being a straightforward simile (as in Ríg 35/7–8), convey much more than that. She sees in his eyes the snake-like spirit of the man: the venomous hate, treacherous subtlety, pitiless hostility. Because she sees this, she orders his maiming: let him crawl like a snake. Egill too evokes the total threat of the serpent's power when he describes the eye of Eiríkr blóðox as 'the snake-glittering moon of his forehead', ormfráan ennimáni, which balefully casts 'rays of terror', ægigeislum, down upon Egill: 'the sight of that moonlight was not to be trusted'—Vasa tunglskin / tryggt at líta (Arinbjarnarkviða 5). Egill knew he was looking on a mortal enemy, against whom he could never relax his guard. While, within her dramatic context, the queen thinks only of the menace of the snake-like eyes, for an audience of the poem those eyes might also assert the uncanny sovereignty of a prince of elves (cf. commentary to Ríg 35/8).

17/7–8 Sníðið — magni: lit. 'cut him from the strength of his sinews', magni being dat. of deprivation. The construction is usual with verbs of depriving (nema, sneyða, stela), but is not recorded elsewhere of sníða (DH).

sina: a form sinva* (OE sinwa) is not recorded, but would be quite regular (cf. gen. pl. of other wō-stem nouns, stǫðva, grva; Noreen § 380), as well as metrically desirable; see SG and Vkv Introd IV. E.

17/10 Sævarstǫð: -stǫð, 'landing place by water', is replaced by the commoner place-name element -staðr, 'place of settlement', in the prose narrative. Translation of Sævarstǫð as a place-name (rather than 'at the sea landing, the beach where boats are drawn up'; cf. JH Vkv), is required by the context here and in 20/4, and is so understood in the prose. I have translated Sævar- as 'sea' rather than 'lake' (as in 1/5) because of the hint in 41/4–5 that Sævarstǫð is a tidal island.

Prose í knésfótum: i.e. knésbótum, -bót- from boht-*, 'curved hollow'.

18/1–10 Skínn — borinn: on this remarkable lament for a sword that has no role in the poem see Vkv Introd III. A. 2, IV. C. The stanza has two flaws, (a) in lines 1–2 skínn does not alliterate with sverð, and (b) the repetition of borinn in lines 8 and 10 and the repetitive sense of 7–8 and 9–10 suggest that one pair of lines is redundant. Variant versions of the stanza have probably been awkwardly assembled. In line 2 I have introduced the term skyggt from the description of the sword Mímungr in Velent 98 (sverð skyggt ok merkt gulli, ok hjaltat fagrt, 'a sword finely polished and patterned with gold and set with a handsome hilt'). That skyggt is an old word is evident from the phrase svartskyggð sverð, 'black-honed swords' in Þorbjörn hornklofi's Glymdrápa 7 (c. 900). On the etymology of skyggja, 'to polish', see AEW s.v., Íslensk orðsifjabók s.v. I would suppose that skyggt implied 'polished to a mirror-like quality, catching light and shade' (cf. skuggsjá, 'mirror'), and that svartskyggt meant 'polished so free of rust and stain that the darkness of the metal shone out'.

18/14 bauga rauða: the general pl. (for excellent parallels see SG) gives a finer extravagance to Völundr's despair than itemization of the single ring that Bǫðvildr had been given. The other 699 rings would also have been taken, with the rest of his treasure.

19/1 Sat — ávalt: for the hypermetrical line cf. 6/5.

19/3 vél ... heldr: the poet plays with the double senses in both words. Vél is 'trickery', 'deception' and also 'subtle (material) device'. Völundr works on his schemes of revenge all the time that he is fashioning his ingenious treasures (and, I suggest, his wings; see commentary to 29/1–4). Heldr is to be interpreted both as 'rather', 'somewhat', i.e. an ironic understatement for 'very (rapidly)', and as 'rather', 'in preference to', referring back to 19/1: né hann svaf (vél gərði hann heldr).

Vél, in the sense 'device made with skill', is later recorded than vél, 'deceit', and may often seem to carry an element of deceit with it (e.g. the net Loki invented was recognized as a vél ... til at taka fiska, 'a device to catch fish with', SnE 68; cf. also veiðivél, vígvel, 'instruments of hunting, of war', Fritzner s.vv.), but the vb. véla is recorded in Grím 6/5 of the making of the divine hall Valaskjálf (er vélti sér / áss í árdaga, 'which Óðinn(?) crafted for himself in ancient days'), where the notion of craftsmanship predominates over any sense of trickery. Whether or not the two senses of vél relate to two words of distinct etymological origins (see AEW s.v.), it is likely that play upon the two senses arose early in the language.

20/1 Drifo: DH argue that this vb. shows that Vqlundr's smithy cannot have been on an island (despite ór eyio, 29/8; í hólmi, 40/4). The term pgurstund, 41/5, and the fact that Bǫðvildr 'walked' from the island 29/9, would seem to imply a tidal island, or (in addition) one that might be reached in winter over the ice.

20/2 dýr: commonly taken as a nonce substantival use of the neut. pl. of adj. dýrr, 'precious (things)'. Kock (b), 109–10, notes the parallel of OSwed neut. pl. góð, 'property', 'wealth' in laws (Sigsk 52/5 Meniu góð is uncertain). It is just conceivable that a pun on dýr, 'beasts', is intended, an allusion to the reason the boys gave for going off on an expedition, namely, 'to survey the game' (cf. Velent 106–7, where the boys are said to be hunting when they visit Vqlundr). An ambiguity in dýr might be intended to indicate their impish deceit. Despite these possibilities, dýr remains somewhat suspect: would it be possible to read dýrð, 'splendour (of wealth)'? There are no uses of dýrð in ON that cannot be related to Christian 'divine splendour', 'glory', but the formation of dýrð must be pre-Christian (it is not borrowed from OE, which has no parallel form), and there is a secular parallel in OHG tiurida, 'riches' (Graff v. 454). (Cf. the OHG gloss freisige tiurida, 'dangerous riches', for pretiosa pericula, 'precious perils (i.e. of wealth)' of Boethius, The Consolation of Philosophy, Metre v. 30; in Alfred, ASPR v. 163, line 58: frēcnu gestreōn, 'perilous treasure'. For other OHG secular uses cf. Stank-tiurida, 'richness of perfume', Wat-tiurida, 'richness of clothing'.)

21/3 opin var illúð: when the coffer was open, two other things became 'open', patent, at the same time: (a) the inherent malignity of the jewels, which were provoking covetousness and murder (on this significance of illúð in the context, the meaning of the last four lines of the stanza depends); (b) the malevolence visible on the face of Vqlundr as he stands behind the craning necks of the boys; it is then that the way to kill them becomes obvious to him: sneið af hǫfuð, 25/1 (SG).

illúð, 'evil mind, intent', 'hatred', from ill-hugð (cf. ástúð, 'loving mind', 'love'; hugð* is recorded only in the gen. sg. hugðar-, implying 'after one's own heart', 'dear'; Fritzner s.vv. hugð, hugðarmaðr).

21/5–8 Fiqlð — gørsimar: the rich treasure showed itself—sýndiz—to the boys in its material substance of gold and jewels. They did not see it as an image of their death, when they too will 'show themselves' as jewelled treasures (25/5–16). There is no reason to alter menia to meina (SG). For this explicit sense of sýndiz cf. Post 189, lines 21–2: En Simon sýndiz Neroni á hinum þriðja degi, ok sagðiz upp hafa risit af dauða, 'Simon showed himself to Nero on the third day and said he had risen from death'.

menia, 'necklaces', used generally of hoarded wealth (cf. Fáf 16/3 ... meðan ek um meniom lág, i.e. 'while I lay on the dragon-hoard'; also Akv 26/3).

at væri gull rautt: though alteration to gull rautt vera would normalize the metre (SG), the finite vb. væri is a more telling contrast to sýndiz in the preceding line.

gørsimar: probably originally a legal term for 'adjudicated, full, payment' in Old Danish law, earliest found in OE from the late 10 and 11 c. (see ASC glossary s.v.

gersum; OED s.v. gersum). No legal sense is clearly attested in ON or OE; the general sense 'costly things' is evident from the ASC annal for 1070 (MS. E, i. 205): hi nāmen þære swā mycele gold 7 seolfre 7 swā manega gersumas on sceat 7 on scrūd 7 on bokes swā nān man ne mæi ðder tellen, 'they seized there so much gold and silver and so many valuables in the form of money, garments, and books that no man could give another the account of it'. For further references see Björkman 152.

22/1–8 Komið — fyndið: see Vkv Introd II D.

23/4 baug: there is no certain parallel for the use of sg. baugr with the pl. sense 'rings', or as a general term for treasure.

25/1 Sneið af hǫfuð: SG suggest that Vqlundr beheaded the boys by bringing down the heavy lid of the treasure chest upon their necks, a motif in folk-tale and ballad. The occurrence of the motif in Gregory of Tours' Historia Francorum (ix. 34, cited by SG), shows, however, that this was not as swift and neat a method of execution as the verb sneið suggests: Fredegunde, tired of her arrogant daughter's vituperations, offers to make peace with her and opens a treasure chest filled with necklaces and precious ornaments, giving her daughter many gifts with her own hand. Saying that now she is weary, and telling her daughter to look in and choose for herself, she slams the coffer lid down on her daughter's neck, strangling her. However, a maid shrieks for help, and the daughter is preserved, to pursue the feud with even greater bitterness. The physical details in Gregory's account seem authentic enough. See Newbold for the wider context.

25/2 húna: properly 'bear cubs' (cf. hvítbjarnarhúnn, Flat i. 253), once recorded of fawns (in the Icelandic MS. AM 178 fol. of Saga Þiðriks 165, n. 6); used familiarly of children in Vkv here and 32/4, and (no doubt borrowed from Vkv) in Ghv 12/1 (in the context also of the beheading of children—Atli's). Magnússon, 28, notes that this colloquial use of húnn is still current in the Vestfirðir and Breiðafjörður (relationship with Norw hyn, 'bearcub', 'child', is not philologically agreed). See Vkv Introd III D.

25/3 fen fípturs: also 34/7. A literal translation has no meaning for us: 'wet ground, swamp, of the fetter'. Fípturs is either based on a scribal error (so firmly embedded that it is repeated, as if meaningful), or it has a technical sense relating to the equipment of a forge which we do not know from ON or OE records. It could indeed be a scribe's substitution of a familiar ON word for one he did not understand. The conjectural translation is based (a) on the context: wet earth where bodies might be buried in a smithy (cf. 34/1; also the prone figure behind the anvil on the Franks Casket) would be found where the water used for tempering steel would flow away, into a sump or pit; (b) on the statement in Velent 107 that Velent hid the boys' bodies under the bellows in a deep pit (í grǫf eina djúpa; though, as Velent has already (99) hidden his best sword under the bellows, this pit is not the same as the wet fen of Vkv); (c) on the possibility that fípturs can be connected with a term Fesselgruebn used in Salzburg for the hollowed-out pit in the hearth which hoards the warm embers, Fessel—possibly being related to terms for ‘vessel’, ‘vat’ (see DH; Schmeller 1. 777 s.v. Festlgrueben), which may well be etymologically linked with terms for ‘fetter’ (AEW s.vv. fat, fjöturr, and DW s.vv. Fass, Fessel), the significances ‘holding’, ‘enclosing’ being common to vessels and fetters; both stems have the same ablaut grade (cf. OE fæt, fætelse, feter). So fjöturr might be a constructed cistern, an open-ended, well-like ‘vat’, for draining away the forge’s water through discarded ashes; these would silt up in the ‘container’ and provide a fine burial place. But the problem of the reading fjóturs is far from solved (cf. JH Vkv 70). Further research into Gmc forge-vocabulary might bring a better reading to light: to meet fjöturr in the same poem with the distinct senses ‘fetter’ (12/8) and ‘forge-well’ is disconcerting.

25/5 skálar: the term ‘bowls’ here is cruelly anticipatory (cf. the more explicit use of the motif in Am 79/3–4: Hausa . . . þeira / hafða at ólskálom, ‘their skulls used as ale-bowls’; see commentary to Am ad loc., DH, SG, JH Vkv. A most detailed description of the conversion of enemy skulls into drinking vessels is Herodotus’ account of Scythian practice (iv. 65; see de Vries (d), 184). On the shamanistic analogues to the ‘remaking’ of the boys’ heads see Vkv Introd II. F.

25/8 seldi: in the prose after stanza 17 we are told that only Niðuðr dared to visit Völundr. If this was a tradition known to the poet, then seldi would imply that Völundr gave the bowls to Niðuðr on one of his visits; the other gifts were ‘sent’. I have emended senda to selda in 35/4, because correspondence in stanzas 25 and 35 should be exact in this respect (though the prose may have little value for guiding correction of the verse here).

25/10 iarnasteina: in ON only in Vkv (also 35/6), Guð I 18/7, Guð III 9/4. OE eorcnanstān (variants eorcan-, eorclan-, e(a)rcnan-) is more frequent, occurring (a) five times in poetry (e.g. for the jewels on the great necklace that is compared with the Brōsinga mene, Beowulf 1208; Grein (a) s.v. eorcnanstān), (b) several times for margarita, ‘pearl’, in glosses to the Gospel and homiletic texts (e.g. Ne weorpað eorcnanstānas ēowre beforan swinum, Rushworth Matthew 7: 6), (c) once glossing topaz-ion, Psalm 118: 127, Cambridge Psalter of Eadwine 316 (see BT Suppl. s.v. eorcnanstān). No other Gmc records have the equivalent of iarnasteinn/eorcnanstān, and it seems likely that the rare ON word is borrowed from OE (perhaps in the context of the Weland legend, see Vkv Introd III. A. 3) and later adopted by the Guð I, III poets. Yet it is certain that the stem erkn-* is common Gmc, connoting ‘clarity’, ‘purity’, ‘trueness’, cf. Gothic airkniba, ‘purity’; OHG erchan, ‘pure’, erchanpruoder, ‘true (blood) brother’, deriving from an IE root erǵ-, ‘upright, proper’ (see S. Mann s.v.). In West Gmc erkn- is a common element in personal names (cf. St Earconuald, Bishop of the East Saxons 675–93; Bede iv. vi) and must have been an ancient part of OE vocabulary. A Semitic origin for OE eorcnanstān, ON jarknasteinn has however been postulated in the Jewish-Aramaic term yarqan, itself rare, found only in the Aramaic interpretations of Hebrew texts (Targums) in the context of the high priest’s breast-plate in Exodus 27: 17, 39: 10 and Ezekiel 28: 13 (based on Exodus), where it is rendered topazius (in Vetus Latina, Septuagint, and Vulgate). If yarqan reached OE, it would presumably be through glosses on these three passages (or some learned note by Jerome). Where influence of Targum yarqan (from the common root yrq, ‘be green/yellow’) is seen in the continental lists of the breast-plate jewels, it is not in any borrowing of the word yarqan, but in the translation of it into a term for a green/yellow stone (such as ‘emerald’ or ‘prasiu’; see Blondheim lxxvii § 9, lxxviii § 13; I owe this reference and all the information on yarqan to the generous and illuminating advice of Sebastian Brock, Oxford. The perfunctory identification of the source of ON jarknasteinn as ‘chaldäisch jarkān’ was first made by Bouterwek in 1859, followed by Sievers and de Vries, AEW s.v., where bibliographical references are given).

In the lapidaries known to the Anglo-Saxons and learned Norsemen (see Foote 146–52) no form of Aramaic yarqan is found. A surprising coincidence may, however, be noted in the efficacy of the iarnasteinar that Guðrún picks from the boiling cauldron (Guð III 9/1–4) and of the Thophasion (i.e. the Aramaic yarqan) in the Ashmole Lapidary: Thys stoune ys yleke to golde, and yff he be pvt yn eny water bovlyent thou mayste pvt thynne hande [sic] and suffre the hete of the water through the vertu of thys stoune (English Medieval Lapidaries 58; see also Marbode of Rennes (1035–1123), De Lapidibus 50–1 where the topaz is said to calm boiling water: Ferventes etiam compescere dicitur undas; this property is usually that of the stone hephaestites, but it appears to have clung to the topaz in later tradition).

The rareness of Aramaic yarkan and the barely visible traces of later traditions relating to the term in Europe, make it hardly possible to accept Nerman’s suggestion, 48–50, that the Goths brought the gem-name jarkān from the Orient c. AD 200–700. Nerman’s work takes no account of the OE glosses for eorcnanstān.

25/11 sendi: a subtle ellipsis. We are not told how he fabricated these surreal jewels (cf. sveip . . . silfri, 25/7; sló, 25/15). McKinnell (b), 20, notes the ironic aptness of sending eyes to the watchful queen.

25/15 brióstringlor: hap. leg.; kringla, ‘circle’, is not elsewhere recorded of jewellery; here presumably a ‘circular ornament for the bodice of a garment’.

26/1 On the missing lines before this stanza see Vkv Introd II. D.

26/3 The missing line may well have contained a phrase elaborating upon baugi (e.g. beztu gorsimi). For omission of one line in a sequence of four alliterating on the same letter cf. Ríg 7/5, 48/7).

26/5 Þoriga ek: i.e. Þori-ek-a ek* (pron. repeated because of ellision).

27/8 at sama hófi: ‘of the same appropriate standard (as before)’; cf. hæfa, ‘to be fitting, appropriate, of the right measure’, Fritzner s.v. *hóf*² § 1.

28/1 Bar — bióri, ‘overbore her with beer’; for bera e-n e-u, ‘to bear a person down by some means’ see Vigfússon s.v. bera A. II. 2 (e.g. bera e-n ofríki, ‘to overcome by superior power’, bera e-n ráðum, ‘to force one’s own decision upon another’); also Fritzner s.v. bera § 11. The poet’s use of bióri rather than, for example, afli, magni, suggests a wry play on the usual idiom: how pathetically easy it was (cf. Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Prologue 647–8).

28/5–6 hefnt harma minna: because (in the MS. text) Völundr says that he has avenged all his harms 'except one' (see commentary to 28/7–8), editors are led into itemizing those harms to determine which has been omitted. DH consider the first harmr to be the taking of the ring, for which the boys are killed; the second to be the taking of the sword, for which Bǫðvildr is raped (these are the two grievances Völundr laments in 18/7–14). The third would then be the cutting of his sinews, which he 'avenges' when he flies off and discloses his crimes to Níðuðr (see also SG). A broader concept of his 'harms' may be preferable: e.g. that the whole theft of his wealth is avenged by the murder of the gold-greedy boys; that his physical maiming is avenged by the physical conquest of the girl; that his imprisonment is flouted by his undreamed-of escape. If we adopt emendation of nema to né in 28/7 (see commentary to 28/7–8), these equations are not necessary.

28/7–8 allra — íviðgirma: there are three main ways of interpreting these lines. In 28/8 the meaningless 'giarira' of the MS. requires emendation. Most commonly it is emended to a form of adj. giarn, 'eager', to give the compound íviðgiarn, 'zealous in animosity', and refer to Völundr's persecutors on whom he avenges his harms. Dat. pl. íviðgiarnom (FJ (b)) would fittingly relate to both king and queen as persecutors; dat. sg. fem. íviðgiarnri (SG; a slighter palaeographical change) would relate to the queen only. While Gmc inwid, 'deceitful malice', is common in OE, OS, OHG, it is not with certainty found in ON except in Vkv 28/8 (see commentary to Vsp 2/6). The formation íviðgiarn would however, be regular in ON (cf. lægiarn, Vsp 34/3). It does not occur in OE or OHG, but OS has the phrase inuuiðeas gern, used of Judas, 'eager for malice', going to betray Christ, Heliand 4628.

I have adopted an alternative emendation of 'giarira' to girma (fem. gen. pl.) to give íviðgirma, a loanword (I suggest) from OE inwidgirn, 'treacherous trap or snare' (recorded in the pl. form inwitgyrene, translating laqueos in the OE metrical version of the Paris Psalter, Psalm 139: 5: forhydden oferhygde mē / inwitgyrene, 'the proud have hidden snares for me'; ASPR v. 136). Though inwidgirn occurs only here in OE, similar compounds are favoured in OE verse, e.g. inwitnet, 'net of guile', Beowulf 2167 (of political treachery), inwitwraðn, 'fetter of spite', Andreas 63, 946 (of heathen captivity; see Grein s.v. inwid-, inwit- for the numerous compounds); the metaphorical use of 'snare' is echoed in the OE homilists (see syngrin, 'snare of sin', BT s.v.). OE girn (in various forms: gyrn, grin, gryn) is common and continues into modern usage in Scotland and northern England; see EDD s.v. Grin sb. It is possible that the erroneous 'giarira' derives from an attempt to convert a form girma, unfamiliar in ON, into a fitting form of adj. giarn, or that an OE -girn was adapted into the broken form -giarn by this analogy.

We have now two main alternative interpretations of 28/7–8: Nú hefi ek hefnt / harma minna . . . 'Now I have avenged my harms . . .'

1. allra nema einna (pl. for sg.) íviðgiarnom / íviðgiarnri, 'all—save one—upon the malevolent one(s)'
2. allra nema einna (pl. for sg.) íviðgirma, 'all—save one—of the envious snares'.

'Snares' here would embrace all the cruel plots against him (trapping him at his home, disabling him to keep him imprisoned, handling him like a wild creature, 16–17).

In 2. some minor variants might be preferred: (a) reading sg. einna[r]; or (b) sg. einna[r] and íviðgimar, i.e. 'except for one envious snare', with specific reference to the 'snaring' of Völundr by the cutting of his sinews: the girn caught especially the feet of the victim; cf. Psalm 56: 7: Fötum hēo minum / fæcne grine / grame gearwodon, 'For my feet treacherous traps cruel foes prepared'; ASPR v. 9. For an emendation einna[r] cf. unga[r], 1/3, 3/9.

To accept either of these two alternatives we need to feel satisfied that Völundr's escape, together with the crushing níð of his disclosures, could constitute a form of hefnd, 'revenge'. It is certainly mockery, but, as revenge, it is not in the same category as the deeds his níð refers to: murder and rape. On that account I have turned to a third alternative reading. In 28/7 the MS. reads 'nema | eina'. Elsewhere in R nema is written 'nēa' without exception (I note 46 instances of 'nēa' conj., 2 of 'nēa' vb.—fyrnema, Lks 57; nema, Alv 1—but no 'nema' spellings). Vkv has two 'nēa' spellings, prose before 18 and 26/6; could 'nema', 28/7, be a scribal error for nē, a dittography anticipating the three minims in 'eina'? A reading allra né einna / íviðgirma, if it could be interpreted 'all—not (just) some / not (only) one—of the vicious snares', would be Völundr's declaration that his vengeance is now complete and that he is free to fly off: as he could have done, of course, long before, had he not deliberately stayed to get his vengeance.

As contextually preferable, I have adopted in the text allra né einna, although I have not found an exact parallel for it. In Guð III 5/3–4: lifa þeir né einir / þriggia tōga manna, 'there lives not one of those thirty men', né einir, 'no single ones', 'not one individual', would provide a parallel for a singular significance in the pl. einna (DH). Gen. pl. einna with the sense 'of single ones', dependent upon a superlative, is a common idiom (cf. Háv 64/4–6: hann þat finnr, / er með fræknom kōmr, / at engi er einna hvatastr, 'a man finds, when he comes among the brave, that no one is the boldest of each of those'; see Vigfússon s.v. einn A. v), but in usage einna with superlative has virtually become synonymous with allra, 'of all' (see Fritzner s.v. einn § 4). Distributive contrast phrases, 'one and all', 'all and some', identifying the individual who comprises the totality, are proverbially current in early English (see OED s.v. all adj. 12; MED s.v. on pron. 3 (c)). In ON the rhetorical contrast of allr and einn is much liked by some poets (cf. Brot 2/7–8: allra eiða / einn fulltrúi, also 8/5–6, 10/3–4, 12/7–8), but I have not found in ON a phrase allir ok einir* (as against, e.g., allir / ok þó ýmsir, 'all and yet severally', i.e. 'all and every', Sigsk 42/5–6).

If the reading allra né einna is preferred for 28/7, íviðgiarnom / íviðgiarnri could still be read for 28/8, though I do not think such a reading would be as forceful as íviðgirma.

29/1–4 Vél — rekkar: perhaps the most difficult lines in the poem. The determining factors for interpretation seem to me to be: (a) MS. Vel ek cannot be rendered 'Fortunate, in happy case, [am] I', as there is no parallel for such an idiom, with adv. 'well' and nom. 'I', in Gmc; (b) Verða must in the context be either (i) present optative, 'May I become/be . . .', a syntax difficult to parallel in ON (discussed below), or (ii) present/future indicative verð with negative suffix -a; (c) á fítiom is ambiguous, in that it could refer literally to the webbed feet of a bird, or figuratively—jocularly, sardonically—to the feet or legs of a man; (d) it is the moment when Völundr is to experiment in flying. I offer a tentative interpretation of these lines, requiring one emendation.

Vél: we might expect Völundr's means of escape to be mentioned here, if anywhere (see Vkv Introd II. E). I suggest, therefore, reading vél, with the two senses (a) 'subtle trick' (played on Níðuðr), and (b) 'device', 'machine' (for flying) to provide the expected allusion to the traditional artefact (already anticipated no doubt in vél, 19/3). In the context of fítiom it may be notable that a third meaning for vél could be relevant, namely, 'bird's tail' (variously vél and véli, cf. vélifðrit, 'tail feather', Heiðr 44). On one of the Leeds Crosses Völundr's flying device has a distinct tail (Nedoma (a), 325). The reading vél requires the addition of a vb. á, '(I) have' (cf. omission of prep. á, 23/2).

fítiom: (a) must refer to Völundr's feet/legs (incapacitated by Níðuðr's men) and (b) identifies his feet as those of a bird. We cannot disregard the narrative reference in the term fítiom. Völundr is now taking on the accoutrements of a bird. When he is ready to fly off—like his swan wife—he jocularly calls his lower limbs 'webbed feet', identifying with her. The joke comes to him with the joy of freedom. The use of fítar of human legs/feet is only found here, a usage no doubt created by the context (though Snorri's use of fit for the hand or arm enriched with gold by a brave prince, Háttatal 42/5–8, suggests that transference to a human situation might not have been uncommon). While fit might be used, in verse, of the membranous claw-foot of eagle or of wolf (see LP s.v., Háttatal 56/7–8), it is most commonly associated with the webbed feet of swimming birds, fítuglar, and the hind flipper of a seal.

Verða (a) optative expressing a wish or act of will, 'May I be / I now will be on my webbed feet' seems strangely followed by 'those that Níðuðr's men took from me'. But this may be part of the joke. How can Völundr rise to his feet, when they have been taken from him? Níðuðr's men deprived him of his human fítar, when he needed to walk like a man, but now he can rise on his bird's fítar, because he has wings to lift him. It is an ironic conundrum: what moves better lame than not lame? Völundr á fítiom—i.e. when he has wings.

To me the only difficulty in this interpretation is the lack of parallels for the use of the 1st person sg. of the pres. optative in an independent clause. Nygaard § 182 ('1ste pers. findes kun enkeltvis') and Heusler (c) § 418, give no examples. B. Mitchell, § 884, has found none in OE. Grimm iv. 80–2, however, offers a few examples from MHG which seem to me to show that this optative usage was not alien to Gmc (as Behre 18, n. 1, asserts; cited by Mitchell): e.g. ich si der bote, 'May I be the messenger!'; ich sei gestigen! 'May I be raised up/mounted!' (the context is allusive and uncertain here, the implication probably sexual; Ring 867). Grimm notes the survival of this optative usage in the self-cursing of later times: ich sei des teufels! 'May I belong to the devil!' If the poet of Vkv meant to represent Völundr as revealing his trick—vél—he might employ the patter of magicians and illusionists who practised for money: 'Let me now show you how I fly! May I now rise in the air!' So Simon Magus tells the people of Rome, who refuse to desert Peter for him, that he will abandon them and fly to God; 'For I ascend and will show myself to this people what kind of being I am'. And all saw him lifted on high above all Rome, its temples and its mountains (Acts of Peter ch. 32; cf. Post 102–3, 194–5). The illusionist often announces beforehand what he means to do, so that his audience will see what they expect. Lucifer's aspiration to mount higher than God is couched in just such terms: In caelum conscendam . . . Ascendam super altitudinem nubium, Similis ero Altissimo, 'I will ascend into heaven . . . I will ascend above the heights of the clouds, I will be like the most High' (Isaiah 14: 13, 14. We may note that in Latin the 1st person sg. pres. optative and future in verbs of the third conjugation are formally identical).

Verða (b) present indicative with enclitic negative, 'I shall not be on the legs/feet that Níðuðr's men took from me' (because I have a vél—I shall be on wings and need no bird's feet). I see less wit, or subtlety, in the use of fítiom here than in (a). Elsewhere in the poem the enclitic negative with the first person sg. pres. indic. is accompanied by two forms of the pronoun: sékka ek, 18/9; bíðka ek, 18/13; Þoriga ek, 26/5. I therefore think it unlikely that the poet intended a negative here.

Renderings with other emendations have been suggested, e.g. Véli ek, 'I am playing a trick', or Véla ek, 'May I play a trick', a parallel to Verða ek, but I have no evidence that véla might be used absolutely, without an object. In the midst of these difficulties the easy way out—Vil ek . . . verða á fítiom, 'I mean to take to those webbed feet'—looks attractive. But I think it likely, at this point in the action, that more verbal play than fítiom is intended (see Vkv Introd IV. D).

20/9 tregði þor friðils: I would suppose that the poet knew a version of the tale extant in Velent, in which the princess and Velent want to marry each other, and are presumably in love (Velent 110, 111). He does not reproduce this stereotyped situation, but shows the girl and the man affected with feeling for each other in different ways, she with a sense of loss when he goes, he with a possessive protectiveness (cf. 33). For a parallel to her reaction, see Chaucer, Reeve's Tale 314–28.

30/1–6 Úti — hvílaz: if we assume that the salgarðr is approached through the salr, the action is clear. The queen, who was (I suggest) outside the royal house when Völundr first came, in chains (16), is again depicted outside when he returns flying. She enters, presumably to find out whether Níðuðr has seen him. The salgarðr where he rests I interpret as a paved or grassy precinct private to the royal salr, though the term is nowhere else found (in Velent 109 the king's daughter is in her grasgarðr when she breaks her ring). From this open air hall-garden or court the king sees and speaks to Völundr. It is improbable that salgarðr refers to the house wall or a high window in it (DH, SG).

en hann — hvílaz: it has been suggested (JH Vkv) that hann here is Völundr, but it would be ridiculous if the hero had to rest at the beginning of his exultant flight. Exhaustion is fitting for Níðuðr in his sleepless grief, and for the swan maidens after their long migration (for whom the same phrasing is used, 1/6), but not for Vqlundr now. We are to imagine him hanging in the air (cf. 37/9–10) above Níðuðr, as birds of prey do, almost stationary, watching his victim. The author of Velent 113 (whose imagination is more commonplace) gives him a more solid speaking position on a turret.

31/4 sízt — dauða: lit. 'after my dead sons', i.e. 'after my sons were dead': a rare use of sízt as prep. with acc.; see Fritzner s.v. sízt, adv. § 2; LP s.v. síz § 3.

31/5 Kell mik: for examples of impersonal vb. kala see esp. Vigfússon s.v.

31/6 kpld . . . ráð, 'hostile', 'evil-bringing' counsel, cf. Lks 51/6. For the deadly implications of kaldr, 'cold', see commentary to Akv 2/6. That it is 'coldly fatal' to follow women's advice is a proverbial piece of anti-feminism common to ON and ME, earliest recorded—after the allusion in Vkv—in the Proverbs of Alfred (c. 1150) 122 line 336: cold red is quene red, 'women's counsel is cold counsel' (for later instances see DH 157, on Vafþ 10; I have not yet located the phrase kpldum snótarráðum, but it does not occur in Pórsdr, as DH state). The poet of Vkv uses the proverb with a subtlety unparalleled in other texts, making the chill fear that wracks the king's head an anticipation of the metaphorical coldness of the fatal truth.

31/7 Vilnomk: the reflexive form of vilia strengthens the personal intensity of reference: 'to desire for one's own sake'; see Fritzner s.v. vilja § 1.

32/3 heilom: to the senses 'physically well' and 'blessed by good fortune', the sense 'undivided' takes precedence in 15/3 (heil hiú) and also, more gruesomely, here. The boys' bodies are literally 'taken to pieces' by Vqlundr, and this becomes the answer to the king's question. The translation cannot convey all the senses here.

33/1 Eiða: the oaths here have no religious reference, as do the oaths of kinship that Guðrún declares Atli swore to Gunnarr (Akv 30). They resemble rather (SG) the curses of Sigrún against her brother Dagr, when he tells her that he has killed Helgi: curses on his ship, his horse, his sword (HH II 31–2; Vqlundr includes also the shield). Sigrún's curses may be intended to reflect the oaths that—in Viking poetic tradition—would have been sworn by Dagr to Helgi as a pledge of truce (HH II prose before 25). These warrior oaths dictate the curses to be laid on the oath-breaker: if Níðuðr breaks his oaths he will be ineffectual as a warrior and a king, dogged by failure in every enterprise.

33/11–13 vér . . . eigim, . . . þér kunnið, . . . eigim: I interpret the change from ek and þú to the formal pl. vér and þér in the final clause of Vqlundr's conditions as an indication that Vqlundr instinctively speaks of himself and Níðuðr as royal equals. The formal 'we' gives dignity to, and commands respect for, the wife and child he is leaving with Níðuðr. DH note the frequency with which 'I' and 'we' are interchanged casually in ON verse usage, but here in Vkv the shift of personal form seems deliberately significant.

35/4 selda: see commentary to 25/8.

36/2 barni aukinn: aukinn (past part. of auka, 'to increase', cf. Ríg 41/7: ættir ióku) is nowhere else recorded in ON used literally of pregnancy, with or without the addition of barni. In OE, however, ēacen (past part. of ēacen, 'to be increased') is regularly used of pregnancy (as well as related terms, ēacnian, 'to become pregnant'; ēacniende wif, 'pregnant woman'; ēacnung, bearnēacnung, 'conception'; BT s.vv. ēacan, etc.). In a number of instances a phrase 'with child' accompanies ēacen (e.g. Genesis 2237: Hire mōd āstāh / þā hēo wæs magotimbre / be Abrahame / ēacen worden, 'Her pride mounted, when she had become pregnant with a child by Abraham'), but in Deor 11, [Beadohild] ēacen wæs (see Vkv Introd III. A. 3), and in OE Riddle 33 (ASPR III. 197), dohtor min / ēacen (where the play is on ice being pregnant water), ēacen alone suffices to express pregnancy. While we do not have such early domestic vocabulary in ON as we do in OE, it would be surprising if aukinn had once been a common term for 'pregnant' and yet left so little trace in later ON idiom.

37/4 verr um nióta: B. M. Ólsen's emendation (b) 152–3) of MS. níta ('to deny, refuse') is obviously right. Njóta verr is not elsewhere recorded, but would seem to be the ironic obverse of the kindly wish of njóta betr (recorded Blöndal s.v. njóta I. 1. a). The notion of enjoying good fortune is implied in the congratulation: Njót þú heill handa, 'enjoy, fortunate, (the work of) your hands' (Njál 104, Gísl 25, Y-text; cf. also HH I 55/1–4, 56/5–6). The deliberate reversal of the benediction expresses Níðuðr's bitterness.

37/5–8 Erat — skióti: in Velent the only pursuit of Vqlundr that the king orders is that Egill should shoot him down (see Vkv Introd III. A. 2). It is possible however that in Vkv 37/5–6 there is reference to an incident, now lost from traditions, in which Vqlundr/Velent was pursued by a horseman (cf. Velent's own legendary horse that was as fast as a bird: svá skjótr sem fugl fljúgandi, Velent 103, cf. 38).

37/9 skollir, 'sway to and fro', 'flutter', 'hover' (used of ships, pennants, hides hung up to dry, seemingly of movement within a fixed space: see LP, Vigfússon s.v. skolla for illustration). Níðuðr sees Vqlundr circling above him, before soaring up and away.

39/1 Pakkráðr: see Index of Personal Names.

39/5 fagrvarið: like other editors, I keep the nom. form, although acc. fagrvarða would be expected. Two constructions overlap here, 'ask her to go' and 'ask that she go' (at hón gangi fagrvarið). The grammatical independence of the nom. in the oral text gives it an anguished, vocative quality (cf. grætr þú, gullvarið, / grimmom tárom, 'You weep, gold-adorned one, cruel tears', HH II 45/5–6). DH give other instances of such elliptical constructions (cf. Hamð 23/4, 24/9).

40/2 er sggðo mér, 'what people told me'. Níðuðr uses the dignified impersonality of the plural sggðo (equivalent to 'what I was told'). Þoðvildr has no doubt that Vqlundr told him (er sagði þér, 41/2), though, in realistic terms, her coming and going might well have been noted by the house-folk. If it were only the house-folk's gossip, she might have denied it, but Vqlundr's betrayal she cannot. In view of the great speed of the action from 29 onwards, it is unlikely that Bøðvildr already knows she is pregnant (McKinnell (b), 22).

40/3-4 sátuð — saman: a euphemism for intercourse. JH Vkv notes that the same phrase is attributed to the daughter of Jarl Sigvaldi, when she tries to lure Stefnir Þorgilsson indoors so that the Jarl can have him killed: Far hingat, norðmaðr, ok sitjum bæði saman, 'Come over here, Norseman, and let us both sit together'. In the verse with which he (traditionally) replies, he declares he would rather be drenched out on the ocean than warm in her arms (varmr á þínum armum; Óláfs Saga Tryggvasonar of Oddr Snorrason 195; see commentary to Ríg 10/5).

41/5 qgurstund: here there is a play upon two meanings, (a) the brief space of time when the tide holds its highest level and begins to turn (a sense still remembered in Breiðafjörðr and Breiðdalr, Austfirðir, especially; see Magnússon 20-3); and (b) a time of anguish, heaviness of spirit. Sense (a) relates to *qgur*¹ neut. found (i) in the phrase að biða eftir ögrinu, 'to wait for the turning point of the high tide', and (ii) in the compound qgurstund (in ON recorded only in Vkv; not noted by Blöndal). Sense (b) relates to *qgur*² neut. for which the meaning is first determined by a riddle attributed to Björn Guðnason (†1517) of Ögur in Ísafjarðardjúp, in which place-names are referred to by the meaning of their homonym: so Ögur is referred to as Pungur Möður, 'Heavy Heart' (cf. ModIcel vb. ögra, 'to annoy, threaten'. For full references and discussion see Elmevik 56; Magnússon 24-6; JH Vkv). The place-name Ögur (in Landn and Fóst: see Elmevik 54; he notes that forms Qgr, Qgrs sometimes printed in these texts are incorrect, since the MSS. have dissyllabic forms) is presumably to be identified with ModIcel *ögur*³ neut., 'small fjord, inlet, creek' (of which qgurr, Hárþ 13/3, is a masc. variant, see Einarsson 142-4; Elmevik 49). I would have supposed that *qgur*¹ and *qgur*³ were cognate terms (though Magnússon, 27, does not think so), a possible idiomatic association being that *qgur*³ is an inlet reached by *qgur*¹, the tide at its height. Thus the name Qgursvík (Fóst 163) is not necessarily tautological.

An qgurstund, for a sailor, might be an anxious time because he did not wish to be stranded. For Beadohild it expresses her memory of entrapment, and her excuse: she was cut off by the tide, could do nothing—vætr . . . vætr. The poet has chosen qgurstund for all its connotations.

On the contextual adaptability of stund see Vigfússon s.v.

41/7 vætr: for the common use of vætr, 'anything', as an emphatic negative, but without a negative element expressed (as, e.g., in vétki, 'nothing') see LP s.v. vétr § 2, JH Vkv 179-80.

41/8, 10 vinna: the sense 'to hinder, prevent', with dat. but without við, appears to be a poetic usage (LP s.v. § 8, Fritzner s.v. § 13).

INDEX OF PERSONAL NAMES

Bøðvildr: in Norse only recorded in Vkv and a 15 c. document (DN iv. 702. 17 from Jæderen: Bodwildha Andorsd.); in OE found only in Deor. In the Frankish areas of north Germany, however, the name, Baduhilt, is more common: from the 7 c. to the 10 c. twelve women are recorded with this name, the earliest being the wife of Chlodowich II, 639-57. [WAR-HILDA]

Egill: an ancient common Gmc name (Visigothic, OHG, OE, ON). [FEAR-INSPIRING MAN; originally a warrior-name, I assume, based on agi-, 'terror']

Hervqr: an old Norw (Sogn) name, recorded in Landn 46, Njál 284 of the great-grandmother of Ketill flatnefr, Egill Skalla-Grimsson's grandfather. The legendary warrior women who bore this name, Hervqr Angantýr's daughter and Hervqr Heiðrekr's daughter (Heiðr 10-22, 52-3), may have influenced the Vkv interpolator in his naming of the noble swan maiden. [ARMY-DEFENDER: cf. AEW s.v. varr 2]

Hlaðguðr: not found elsewhere. Hlað, 'embroidered band of silk for forehead or garment', is only found in fictitious names (so AEW s.v. hlað). [FILLET-ADORNED-WAR-MAIDEN]

Hlqðvér: ON form of Frankish Chlodowich (OHG Hludwig, OE Hloðwig). Though the first element is uncertain (see AEW s.v. Hloðvér, Hlqðvér), the spelling of R indicates an q vowel. [? originally FAMED-FIGHTER]

Kiárrr: for the derivation from Caesar see commentary to Akv 7/10.

Niðuðr: in ON only in Vkv, in OE only in Deor, where the form has a variant second element, Niðhād. Niðuðr (OHG Nithad), has høðr, 'warrior' (cf. OE heapn, 'battle') as its second element. Nithad is common in Alemannic and Frankish documents from the 8 c. to the 10 c.; it was evidently an ancient name among the Goths, Nidada being the great-grandfather of King Geberich, 318-50, predecessor of Ermanaric (see Vkv Introd n. 30). As JH Vkv 29 points out, Nið- was not used in personal names for men in ON (cf. Niðhoggr the dragon) and was rare in England (one occurrence of Niðmund in 854). [HOSTILE WARRIOR]

Slagfiðr: only in Vkv. Two ways of interpreting this name are considered possible; both would seem to be appropriate for Vqlundr himself: (a) relating Slag-, 'stroke', to the striking of a hammer and -fiðr to the term for a Lapp, we have 'Hammer-smiting Lapp'; (b) relating Slagfiðr to OHG slegifedera, a gloss for penna, 'pinion' ('the feather that strikes the air'), we could (see JH Vkv 28) take -fiðr as adjectival, from fiðr, 'feather', so, 'having feathers, wings' (cf. veðreygr from -auga). Either name could have been a nickname for Vqlundr, the flying smith, in some version of his story, and could have been pressed into service as a personal name for the third brother in Vkv, when that trio developed (see Vkv Introd iv. A). Slag is not a personal-name component elsewhere in Norse; this may suggest a somewhat irregular origin for Slagfiðr as a name.

Svanhvít: a folktale-style name epitomizing the white radiance of the swan maidens. Historical personal names in svan- are rare in Norse, but not uncommon in West Gmc (see AEW s.v. svanr). [SWAN-WHITE]

Vqlundr: the long and widespread popularity of the story appears to have resulted in at least two main variants of the hero's name: (a) with long stem Wēl- metrically identifiable in Waltharius and (most probably) in the OE texts (and possibly in the ON Velent); (b) with short stem Wal- in French chronicle traditions and, as Gal- (Galant), in chansons de geste. A chronicle form Waland (12 c.) has been associated with Norse tradition because of the apparent nom. ending. A mixed form Walundr* (cf. the suffix in Weland, Deor) would normally give the Vqlundr of the R text. Heusler (b), 98, emphasizes that many Gmc variants of heroic names are philologically unreconcilable (e.g. OE Hliðe / ON Hlǫðr, OE Heorrenda / MHG Horant), and supposes that the double form Weland / Walund* represents 'eine spaltung, eine entgleisung . . . die nicht unter die paragraphen der germanischen lautgeschichte fällt'. Clive Tolley has pointed out to me, however, that a Gothic stem in ē (IE ē) might have been borrowed as ē in other Gmc dialects (where æ from IE ē would be expected), if, as many scholars think, the Weland story was indeed of Gothic origin. In Gothic the forms Wēl-* and Wal-* could represent an IE ablaut variation between lengthened ē-grade and o-grade, IE o becoming a in all Gmc dialects. It is, however, difficult to find a Gmc root which shows this ablaut variation and has also significance in the context of the Vqlundr story. As for the name Velent, I would suppose that it was a story-teller's adaptation of a heard form of Weland (cf. Niðungr / Niðungr for Niðuðr), influenced perhaps by such romance names as Flóvent, Flórent, Ívent, Valvent, Úrient. For fuller presentation of Vqlundr variants see Nedoma (a), 40–70.

Pakkráðr: not an ON name, but found in OHG (Dankrat) and occasionally in OE (Pancrēd), probably borrowed from Germany. The introduction of a German name for this minor character suggests that the poet who introduced it knew, and wished to allude to, a German connection of the story. It is not a name found in Piðreks Saga. The fact that assimilation of nk to kk has occurred (compare c. 990 Pangbrandr) might indicate that the name Pakkráðr was a very old element in the poem; but the equivalence of German nk and ON kk would also have been well known at later dates. [GRATEFUL COUNSEL]

Qlrun: not found elsewhere in ON as a personal name, nor in OE. OHG Alarun occurs in a Bavarian document (Förstemann i. 40). Qlrun occurs as a common noun 'ale-rune' in Sigrdr 7, 19. [GOOD FORTUNE/ALE RUNE]

LOKASENNA

CONTENTS

TEXT AND TRANSLATION	332
INTRODUCTION	349
I. Lokasenna and the Cycle of Ambrosia	349
II. Loki's Satire	350
III. The Popular Game of Satire and the Origins of Lokasenna	353
COMMENTARY ON THE TEXT	356

LOKASENNA

Frá Ægi ok goðum

Ægir, er þóro naf[n]i hét Gymir, hann hafði búit ásom ǫl, þá er hann hafði fengit ketil inn mikla, sem nú er sagt. Til þeirar veizlo kom Óðinn ok Frigg kona hans. Þórr kom eigi, þvíat hann var í austrvegi. Sif var þar, kona Þórs, Bragi ok Íðunn kona hans. Týr var þar, hann var einhendr: Fenrisúlfr sleit hönd af hánom þá er hann var bundinn. Þar var Niðrðr ok kona hans Skaði, Freyr ok Freyia, Víðarr son Óðins. Loki var þar ok þjónustomenn Freys, Byggvir ok Beyla. Mart var þar ása ok álfa. Ægir átti tvá þjónustomenn, Fimafengr ok Elder. Þar var lýsigull haft fyrir eldzliós; sialft barsk þar ǫl; þar var griðastaðr mikill. Menn lofoðu miðk hversu góðir þjónustomenn Ægis vóro. Loki mátti eigi heyra þat, ok drap hann Fimafeng. Þá skóko æsir skiöldo sína ok æpðo at Loka, ok elto hann braut til skógar, en þeir fóro at drekka.

Loki hvarf aptr ok hitti úti Eldi. Loki kvaddi hann:

Of Ægir and the gods

Ægir, whose other name was Gymir, had prepared ale for the Æsir, as soon as he had received the great cauldron, as has just been told. To that feast Lokasenna is preserved only in R. In the MS. the title appears before stanza 1.

Prose line 7 Byggvir] beygvir; so also 45/1; by gv^{ir} preceding 43/1 (MS. p. 31 line 32) and 46/1; by gvis 56/2. In the MS. ey is not a variant for y elsewhere. Beyla has perhaps influenced this spelling.

Indication of speakers: as in Skirnismál, some speakers are signalled in the preceding prose: Loki (stanzas 1, 11, 54), Sif (53), Þórr (57). Byggvir (stanza 43) is signalled as speaker (Bygv^{ir} without following q.) within the stanza sequence itself. Otherwise the speakers are noted in the outer margins. Six initials, four of which are followed by q., survive for stanzas 2–8 (e. l.q. e.q. l.q. l.q. b^{ra}). Twelve traces of q (with or without dot) survive for stanzas 12–20, 22–24. For stanza 21 a sign .þ. (with a curl over the upper stroke of þ) is written in the margin (aligned vertically with the traces of q); presumably, from the context, signifying opin ('men hvorledes tegnet kan få denne betydning, ser vi oss ikke i stand til at forklare', FJ Facs 127, line 20). Twelve initials (with or without dot) survive for stanzas 32–42, 44 (l n l n. l. t. l. l. f^{re} l. l.). In the printed text the speakers are stated without palaeographic notation. For further discussion of the indication of speakers in the Eddic poems, see Gunnell (b), 206–12.

The use of capitals: in the prose prologue, capitals mark the beginnings of sentences as printed here (except that Þar line 8, and Þá line 10 do not have capitals); in addition, the following have capitals: Bragi (line 4), Freyr (line 6), Víðarr (line 6), sialft (line 8). The following have marginal capitals: ok (in ok þjónustomenn line 6), Ægir (line 7), Loki (line 10). In the prose epilogue, initial capitals correspond to the beginnings of sentences as printed here, except that Þar (line 1) does not have a capital, and en (en meðan, line 5) does; the epilogue opens with a marginal capital. The beginnings of sentences, as printed here, in the prose passages interspersed in the poem, are marked in the MS. with capitals; Þá (before 53) has a marginal capital. In the poem, marginal capitals are used to introduce stanzas 11, 15, 29, 36, 43, 44, 50, 51, 57, 63, 65; other stanzas begin with the usual initial capital.

came Óðinn and Frigg his wife. Þórr did not come, because he was in eastern lands. Sif was there, Þórr's wife, Bragi and Íðunn his wife. Týr was there; he had only one hand: the Wolf Fenrir tore his hand off when the bonds were put on him. Niðrðr was there and his wife Skaði, Freyr and Freyia, Víðarr Óðinn's son. Loki was there and Freyr's servants, Byggvir and Beyla. There was a great company of Æsir and elves. Ægir had two serving-men, Fimafengr and Eldir. Gleaming gold was used there instead of candlelight. The ale served itself there. It was a place of strict sanctuary. People praised the excellence of Ægir's serving-men highly. Loki could not bear to hear that and he killed Fimafengr. Then the Æsir brandished their shields and yelled at Loki and chased him away to the forest, and themselves went to drink.

Loki turned back and met Eldir outside. Loki greeted him:

Loki kvað:

1 Segðu þat, Eldir, svá at þú einugi
feti gangir framarr, hvat hér inni hafa at ǫlmálo sigtíva synir?

Loki said:

Tell me, Turnspit, before you take one footstep further, what here indoors
do they have as ale-talk,
the sons of the conquering gods?

Eldir kvað:

2 Of vápn sín dæma
ok um vígrisni sína
sigtíva synir.
Ása ok álfa,
er hér inni ero,
mangi er þér í orði vinr.

Eldir said:

Their weapons they speak of
and their war prowess,
the sons of the conquering gods.
Among the Æsir and elves
who are here indoors
not one is friend to you in his words.

Loki kvað:

3 Inn skal ganga
Ægis hallir í,
á þat sumbl at síá.
Oll ok áfo

Loki said:

One must go in to Ægir's halls
to behold that banquet.
Bitterness and backbiting

3/4 Oll ok áfo] ioll 7 áfo R. Before oll the scribe has written hropi, confusing his text with that of the following stanza 4/4. He has then deleted hrop with subscript dots, leaving the reading ioll. A later hand has erased the deleted hrop, but the MS. reading is clear from the ultraviolet photograph. In 4/4 the space in the MS. occupied by hropi is the same as in 3/4 and it is possible that the scribe omitted to delete with a dot the final i (as Stefán Karlsson noted in his most helpful correspondence with me in 1983: 'Það getur því meira en verið að skrifara hafi láðst að setja depil undir i og ioll sé villa fyrir oll'). Stefán has more recently presented a very attractive alternative reading for 3/4, namely i ǫll ok áfo. See commentary ad loc.

færi ek ása sonom,
ok blend ek þeim svá meini
mið.

I'll bring to the Æsir's sons and so mix their mead with mischief.

Eldir kvað:

4 Veiztu—ef þú inn gengr
Ægis hallir í
á þat sumbl at síá—
hrópi ok rógi
ef þú eyss á holl regin, á þér muno þau þerra þat.

Eldir said:

You know—if you enter Ægir's halls
to behold that banquet—
if with slander and spite you smear the gracious gods, they will wipe it away on you.

Loki kvað:

5 Veiztu þat, Eldir, ef vit einir skolom
sáryrðom sakaz,
auðigr verða
mun ek í andsvörum—
ef þú mælir til mart!

Loki said:

You know, Turnspit,
if just the two of us are to rail at each other with rending words,
I shall prove rich in my responses—
if you talk too much!

Síðan gekk Loki inn í hollina.
En er þeir sá, er fyrir vóro, hver inn var kominn, þögnóðo þeir allir.

Then Loki went into the hall. But when those who were present saw who had come in, they all fell silent.

Loki kvað:

6 Þyrstr ek kom
þessar hallar til,
Loptr, um langan veg,
áso at biðia
at mér einn gefi
mæran drykk miaðar.

Loki said:

Thirsty I have come to this very hall,
I, Loptr—a long way—to ask the Æsir to offer me one magnificent drink of mead.

7 Hví þegið ér svá, þrungin goð,
at þér mæla né megoð?
Sessa ok staði
velið mér sumbli at,
eða heitið mik heðan!

Why so tongue-tied,
tight-lipped gods,
that you cannot converse?
Seat and seating
select for me at the banquet, or order me off from here!

Bragi kvað:

8 Sessa ok staði

Bragi said:

Seat and seating

velia þér sumbli at æsir aldregi!
Þvíat æsir vito,
hveim þeir alda skolo
gambansumbl um geta.

select for you at the banquet
the Æsir never shall!
For the Æsir are aware for what persons they ought to provide that potent feast.

Loki kvað:

9 Mantu þat, Óðinn, er vit í árdaga
blendom blóði saman?
Qlvi bergia létztu eigi mundo,
nema okr væri báðom borit.

Loki said:

Do you recall, Óðinn,
when we two in the old days blended our blood together?
Taste ale
you told me you would not, unless it was brought to us both.

Óðinn kvað:

10 Ristu þá, Víðarr, ok lát úlfs fður
sitia sumbli at, síðr oss Loki
kveði lastastofom
Ægis hóllo í.

Óðinn said:

Up, then, Víðarr, and allow the Wolf's father to sit at the banquet, lest Loki against us utter words of opprobrium
inside Ægir's hall.

Þá stóð Víðarr upp ok skenkti Loka, en áðr hann drykki, kvaddi hann ásona:

Then Víðarr stood up and poured ale for Loki, but before he drank, he toasted the Æsir:

Loki kvað:

11 Heilir æsir, heilar ásynior
ok öll ginnheilög goð!
—nema sá einn áss,
er innar sitr,
Bragi, bekkíom á.

Loki said:

Blest be the Æsir, blest the Ásynior
and all the sacrosanct gods!
—save for that one of the Æsir who sits further in,
Bragi, on the benches.

Bragi kvað:

12 Mar ok mæki
gef ek þér míns fiár ok bætir þér svá baugi Bragi,

Bragi said:

Steed and sword
from my own store I'll give you —and Bragi will recompense you as well with a ring—lest on the Æsir you take toll for your envy.
Do not anger the gods against you!

síðr þú ásom
öfund um gíaldir.
Gremðu eigi goð at þér!

Loki kvað:

- 13 Íós ok armbauga
 mundu æ vera beggia vanr, Bragi.
 Ása ok álfa,
 er hér inni ero,
 þú ert við víg varastr
 ok skiarrastr við skot!

Bragi kvað:

- 14 Veit ek, ef fyr útan værak
 —svá sem fyr innan emk—
 Ægis holl um kominn, höfuð þitt
 bæra ek í hendi mér
 —lítt er þér þat fyr lygi!

Loki kvað:

- 15 Sniallr ertu í sessi—

 skalatu svá gøra,
 Bragi bekkskrautuðr!
 Vega þú gakk,
 ef þú [v]reiðr sér.
 Hyggz vætr hvatr fyrir!

Iðunn kvað:

- 16 Bið ek, Bragi, barna sifiar duga
 ok allra óskmaga—at þú Loka
 kveðira lastastofom
 Ægis hollu í.

Loki kvað:

- 17 Pegi þú, Iðunn,
 þik kveð ek allra kvenna

Loki said:

Bayard and bracelets—
 you will always be destitute, Bragi, of both!
 Of the Æsir and elves
 who are here indoors
 you are the most wary of war and shy of shots!

Bragi said:

I know, were I outside —as surely as I've entered in to Ægir's hall—
 your head
 I would be carrying in my hand —that's little for you to pay for your lie!

Loki said:

You're courageous on your cushions—
 you shan't achieve that,
 Bragi Bench-Ornament!
 You go and fight
 if you feel furious.
 A mettlesome man thinks nothing stands in his way!

Iðunn said:

I pray, Bragi,
 for the bonds of kin to prove strong,
 that bind born sons and all adopted—so that you may not against Loki utter words of opprobrium
 inside Ægir's hall.

Loki said:

Hold your tongue, Iðunn,
 you I attest of all women

13/5 after ero follows ma deleted (cf. 2/5–6). 14/1 fyr] þyr; perhaps first written þu and partially corrected R 14/6 er] ec R 17/1 Pegi þú] written here as one word, subsequently in the poem as two R vergiarnasta vera, sitztu arma þína

 lagðir itrþvegna
 um þinn bróðurbana.

Iðunn kvað:

- 18 Loka ek kveðka
 lastastofom
 Ægis hollu í.
 Bragi ek kyrr biðrreifan,
 vilkat ek at it [v]reiðir vegiz.

Gefion kvað:

- 19 Hvítit æsir tveir
 skoloð inni hér
 sáryrðom sakaz?
 Lopzki þat veit,

 at hann leikinn er,
 ok hann fiorg ǫll fría?

Loki kvað:

- 20 Pegi þú, Gefion,
 þess mun ek nú geta, er þik glapði at geði—
 sveinn inn hvíti,
 er þér sigli gaf
 ok þú lagðir lær yfir.

Óðinn kvað:

- 21 Err ertu, Loki,
 ok ørviti,
 er þú fær þér Gefion at gremi,
 þviat aldar ørlög
 hygg ek at hón ǫll um viti iafngǫrla sem ek.

to be most man-eager,
 since you put your arms,
 illustriously washed,
 around your brother's slayer.

Iðunn said:

Against Loki I shall not utter words of opprobrium
 inside Ægir's hall.
 Bragi I'll calm,
 beer-gladdened as he is,
 I do not wish you two in your fury to fight.

Gefion said:

Why, you two Æsir,
 must you here indoors
 rail at each other with rending words?
 Of Loptr is it not a characteristic well known that he is whimsical and all the deities dote on him?

Loki said:

Hold your tongue, Gefion, now I will tell of the one who seduced your senses—that blond boy who gave you a trinket and you put your thigh over.

Óðinn said:

You are lunatic, Loki,
 and have lost your wits,
 to get Gefion in rage against you,
 for all the fate of the world

 I think she is aware of as accurately as I.

19/6 fiorg ǫll] fiorgvall; va is presumably a miscopying of av/au (i.e. ǫ) R
 27; see discussion following the text of Lokasenna.

21/1–2 also in SnE

Loki kvað:

- 22 Þegi þú, Óðinn,
þú kunnir aldregi
deila víg með verom.

Opt þú gaft,
þeim er þú gefa skyldira
—enorm slævorom!—sigr.

Óðinn kvað:

- 23 Veiztu, ef ek gaf
þeim er ek gefa né skylda,
enorm slævorom, sigr,
átta vetr
vartu fyr iþrð neðan
kýr mólkandi ok kona, ok hefir þú þar [börn of]
borit,
ok hugða ek þat args aðal.

Loki kvað:

- 24 En þik síða kóðo Sámseyio í,
ok draptu á vétt sem vǫlor.

Vitka líki
fórtu verþiód yfir,
ok hugða ek þat args aðal.

Frigg kvað:

- 25 Órlögom ykrom
skylið aldregi segia seggiom frá—hvat it æsir tveir drýgðuð í árdaga—
firriz æ forn rǫk firar.

Loki kvað:

- 26 Þegi þú, Frigg,
þú ert Fiǫrgyns mǣr

Loki said:

Hold your tongue, Óðinn, you were never able to share out the slaughters among men.

Often you gave whom you should not have given
—the less valiant!—the victory.

Óðinn said:

You know, if I gave whom I should not have given
—the less valiant—the victory,
eight winters
you were under the earth
a milker-of-cows and a matron, and there you've borne babies—

and that I thought an unmanly nature.

Loki said:

But you, they said, did sorcery on Sámsey and tapped on a tub-lid like the shamanesses.
In wizard's guise
you went over the world of men—
and that I thought an unmanly nature.

Frigg said:

The fates you two met with you never must speak about to men—what you two Æsir acted out in the old days—one should keep always away from one's past.

Loki said:

Hold your tongue, Frigg,
you are Fiǫrgynn's daughter ok hefir æ vergiǫrn verit, er þá Véa ok Vilia

léztu þér—Viðris kvæn—báða í baðm um tekit.

and have always been eager for men,
for Véi and Vili you—Viðrir's wife—had both embraced in your bosom.

Frigg kvað:

- 27 Veiztu, ef ek inni ættak
Ægis hǫllom í Baldri líkan bur, út þú né kvæmir
frá ása sonom,
ok væri þá at þér [v]reiðom
vegít!

Frigg said:

You know, if I'd had indoors in Ægir's halls
a boy like Baldr,
you would not have got out from the Æsir's sons—and there'd have been fighting then with fury against you!

Loki kvað:

- 28 Enn vill þú, Frigg,
at ek fleiri telia
mína meistafi?
Ek því réð,
er þú riða sérat
síðan Baldr at sǫlom.

Loki said:

Still you intend, Frigg,
I should itemize more of my malignancies?
I arranged it
that you will never see riding
Baldr again to his halls.

Freyia kvað:

- 29 Ærr ertu, Loki, er þú yðra telr
lióta leiðstafi.
Órlǫg Frigg
hygg ek at ǫll viti,
þótt hon siálfgi segi.

Freyia said:

You are lunatic, Loki,
to relate your likes'
hideous hatefulnesses.
Of all fates Frigg has,
I think, full knowledge,
though she herself may keep silent.

Loki kvað:

- 30 Þegi þú, Freyia, þik kann ek fullgerva—
era þér vamma vant.
Ása ok álfa,
er hér inni ero,
hverr hefir þinn hór verit.

Loki said:

Hold your tongue, Freyia,
I'm fully familiar with you—in you there's no shortage of sins.
Of the Æsir and elves
who are here indoors
each one has been your bed-fellow.

23/7 bǫrn of borit] so 33/6 R

24/1 síða] síga R

25/4 tveir] .ii. R

28/4 réð] rǫp, which could also be interpreted as present tense rǣp R. See commentary.
in SnE 27; see discussion following the text of Lokasenna.

29/4-6 also

Freyia kvað:

- 31 Flá er þér tunga!
Hygg ek at þér fremr my[ni]
ógott um gala.
Reiðir ro þér æsir
ok ásynior—
hryggr muntu heim fara.

Loki kvað:

- 32 Pegi þú, Freyia,
þú ert fordæða
ok meini blandin miðk, sítztik at bræðr þínom
stóðo blíð regin,
ok mundir þú þá, Freyia,
frata!

Niðrðr kvað:

- 33 Þat er válitit,
þótt sér varðer vers fái,
hós eða hvárs.
Hitt er undr, er áss ragr

er hér inn of kominn, ok hefir sá þorn of borit!

Loki kvað:

- 34 Pegi þú, Niðrðr,
þú vart austr heðan
gils um sendr at goðom.
Hymir meyar
hofðo þik at hlandtrogi
ok þér í munn migo.

Niðrðr kvað:

- 35 Sú eromk líkn:
er ek vark langt heðan
gísl um sendr at goðom, þá ek móg gat,

Freyia said:

Treacherous is your tongue!
I think for you too in time
it will chant mischance!
Enraged are the Æsir and Ásynior against you—ruing you'll return home.

Loki said:

Hold your tongue, Freyia,
you are a baleful witch and much mixed with evil—for beside your brother the blithe powers surprised you and then, Freyia, you must have farted!

Niðrðr said:

There's little harm
though ladies get themselves a man, a boy on the side, or both.
But this is an outrage, that an emasculate god has got entry here,
and this fellow's borne babies!

Loki said:

Hold your tongue, Niðrðr,
you were east from here
as a hostage sent to the gods.
Hymir's daughters had you as a piss-trough and made water into your mouth.

Niðrðr said:

This is my solace:
when I was far from here
a hostage sent to the gods,
I begot then a son

31/2 hygg] hvg R (? for hyg); see Lindblad 28–33.
32/5 stóðo] siþo R 32/6 mundir] mdir R

myni] mý R

32/4 sítztik] sitztv R

þann er mangi fiár, ok þikkir sá ása iaðarr.

whom not a soul hates, and a wall of strength he seems for the Æsir.

Loki kvað:

- 36 Hættu nú, Niðrðr,
haf þú á hófi þik!
Munka ek því leyna lengr:
við systor þinni
gaztu slíkan móg—
ok era þó [v]óno verr!

Loki said:

Stop now, Niðrðr,
keep your proper sense of proportion!
I shall not let this longer be secret:
on your sister
you begot such a son—and yet that is no worse than expected!

Týr kvað:

- 37 Freyr er beztr
allra ballriða
ása gorrðom í.
Mey hann né grætir né mannz kono,
ok leysir ór hoptom hvern.

Týr said:

Freyr is the best of all brave knights within the Æsir's walls.
No girl he makes weep
nor any man's wife,
and frees every man from his fetters.

Loki kvað:

- 38 Pegi þú, Týr,
þú kunnir aldregi
bera tilt með tveim.
Handar ennar hægri mun ek hinnar geta, er þér sleit Fenrir frá!

Loki said:

Hold your tongue, Týr,
you never had the talent
for settling two factions fairly.
That right hand
I will recall that Fenrir tore from you!

Týr kvað:

- 39 Handar em ek vanr,
en þú Hróðrsvitnis:
þol er beggia þrá.
Úlfgi hefir ok vel,
er í þngom skal
bíða ragnarøks.

Týr said:

A hand I am deprived of,
and you of Hróðrsvitnir:
the harm is heartache for both.
And the wolf too is not pleased when he must wait in tight straits for the day of the gods to darken.

Loki kvað:

- 40 Pegi þú, Týr,
þat varð þinni kono,

Loki said:

Hold your tongue, Týr,
it turned out for your wife

36/6 era] þera R (þ deleted with subscript dot) anticipates 41/6.

39/5 þngom] bondō R does not alliterate; it at hón átti mög við mér.

 Qln né penning
 hafðir þú þess aldregi vanréttis, vesall!

that she had a boy by me.
 Neither cloth nor coin did you ever acquire for that infringement of your rights, poor fellow!

Freyr kvað:

41 Úlf sé ek liggja
 árósi fyrir,
 unz riúfaz regin:
 því mundu næst,
 nema þú nú þegir,
 bundinn, þolvasmiðr!

Freyr said:
 The Wolf I see recumbent
 at the river mouth,
 until the powers are rent:
 next to him you shall be tied,
 unless you hold your tongue now, mischief-maker!

Loki kvað:

42 Gulli keypta
 léztu Gymis dóttur ok seldir þitt svá sverð
 —en er Muspellz synir ríða Myrkvið yfir, veizta þú þá, vesall, hvé þú vegr.

Loki said:
 With gold you had Gymir's daughter purchased and surrendered, too, your sword
 —but when Muspell's sons ride across Mirkwood you won't know then, poor fellow, how you'll fight.

Byggvir kvað:

43 Veiztu, ef ek øðli ættak sem Ingunar-Freyr,
 ok svá sæl[li]kt setr,
 mergi smæra
 mөлða ek þá meinkráko
 ok lemða alla í liðo.

Byggvir said:
 You know, if I'd had ancestry like Ingunar-Freyr
 and so blest an abode, finer than marrow
 I'd have crushed that malign crow and belaboured every limb in it!

Loki kvað:

44 Hvat er þat it litla, er ek löggra sék,
 ok snapvíst snapir?
 At eyrom Freys mundu æ vera ok und kvernom klaka.

Loki said:
 What is that tiny thing
 I see tail-bobbing and skilfully snapping up scraps?
 At Freyr's ears
 you will always be
 and under the corn-mill chattering.

Byggvir kvað:

45 Byggvir ek heiti, en mik bráðan kveða
 goð qll ok gumar.
 Því em ek hér hróðugr,
 at drekka Hroptz megir
 allir ql saman.

Byggvir said:
 Barley Boy is my name and they say I'm a fiery fellow,
 all the gods and men.
 I'm in high pride here because Hroptz's sons are all drinking ale together.

Loki kvað:

46 Pegi þú, Byggvir,
 þú kunnir aldregi
 deila með mōnnom mat—
 ok þik í fletz strá
 finna né máttu,
 þá er vágo verar.

Loki said:
 Hold your tongue, Barley Boy, you never knew how to mete out victuals among men—and in the straw on the floorboards they never could find you, when fellows were fighting.

Heimdallr kvað:

47 Qlr ertu, Loki,
 svá at þú er[t] ørviti—
 hví né lezkaðu, Loki?
 Þvíat ofdrykkia
 veldr alda hveim,
 er sína mælgí né manat!

Heimdallr said:
 You're so drunk, Loki, that you've lost your wits—
 why not restrain yourself, Loki?
 For overdrinking dominates every man, who forgets how garrulous he can be!

Loki kvað:

48 Pegi, þú, Heimdallr, þér var í árdaga
 it lióta líf um lagit:
 aurgo baki þú munt æ vera ok vaka vörðr goða.

Loki said:
 Hold your tongue, Heimdallr, for you in ancient days
 the ugly life was ordained:
 with muck on your backside you'll always be and keep awake as watch for the gods.

Skaði kvað:

49 Létt er þér, Loki
 —munattu lengi svá
 leika lausom hala,
 þvíat þik á hiqrví skolo ins hrímkalda magar gōrnom binda goð.

Skaði said:
 Light is your mood, Loki,
 —you will not for long toss so free a tail, for on a sword
 with your frost-cold son's guts the gods will bind you.

44/2 ek] ek þat R influenced by er þat in previous line

45/1 Byggvir] Beygvir R. See textual note to prologue line 7.
 see discussion following the text of Lokasenna.

47/3 hví — Loki] also in SnE 27;
 48/4 aurgo] argo R; see commentary.

Loki kvað:

50 Veiztu, ef mik á higrvi skolo ens hrímkalda magar gornom binda goð, fyrstr ok øfstr
var ek at fiðrlagi,
þars vér á Þiaza þrifom.

Skaði kvað:

51 Veiztu, ef fyrstr ok øfstr vartu at fiðrlagi,
þá er ér á Þiaza þrifuð, frá minom véom ok vöngom skolo
þér æ kold ráð koma.

Loki kvað:

52 Léttari í málom
vartu við Laufeyjar son, þá er þú létst mér á beð þinn boðit
—getit verðr oss slíks,

ef vér gorrva skolom
telia vömmín vár.

Þá gekk [Sif] fram ok byrtaði Loka í hrímkálki miðr ok
mælti:

Sif kvað:

53 Heill ver þú nú, Loki, ok tak við hrímkálki
fullom forns miaðar
—heldr þú hana eina
látir með ása sonom

vammalausa vera.

Hann tók við horni ok drakk af:

Loki said:

You know, if—on a sword with my frost-cold son's guts—the gods will bind me, the first and the last was I at the dying,
when we thrust our fingers on Þiazi.

Skaði said:

You know, if the first and the last
you were at the dying, when you thrust your fingers on Þiazi, from my fanes
and fields shall come cold counsel for you for ever.

Loki said:

Lighter in your talk you were with Laufey's son when you had me beckoned to your bed
—such a matter must be mentioned by us if we are completely to count our blemishes.

Then Sif came forward and poured for Loki mead in a crystal goblet and said:

Sif said:

Be welcome now, Loki,
and receive the crystal cup
full of ancient mead
—that you may the sooner admit this one woman among the Æsir's sons
to be without blemish.

He took the horn and drained it:

Loki kvað:

54 Ein þú værir
—ef þú svá værir—
vör ok gröm at veri.
Einn ek veit,
svá at ek vita þikkiomk,
hór ok af Hlórriða,
ok var þat sá inn lævisi Loki.

Beyla kvað:

55 Fiðl qll skíalfa—hygg ek á fœr vera heiman Hlórriða.
Hann ræðr ró
þeim er rægir hér
goð qll ok guma.

Loki kvað:

56 Þegi þú, Beyla,
þú ert Byggvis kvæn
ok meini blandin miðr.
Ókynian meira
koma með ása sonom
—qll ertu, deigia, dritin!

Þá kom Þórr at ok kvað:

Þórr kvað:

57 Þegi þú, rög vætr!
Þér skal minn þrúðhamarr,
Miðllnir, mál fyrnema!
Herða klett
drep ek þér hálsi af, ok verðr þá þíno fiðrvi um farit!

Loki kvað:

58 Iarðar [burr]
er hér nú inn kominn

Loki said:

You'd be the only one
—if indeed you were so—guarded and grudging towards a man.
One man I know
—and I think I do know—was whoring—and in Hlórriði's bed—and that was the calamitous Loki.

Beyla said:

All the mountains are quaking—
here's coming, I think,
Hlórriði from home.
He'll impose peace on him, who pillories here
every god and man.

Loki said:

Hold your tongue, Cow Girl, you are Barley Boy's wife and much mixed with harm.
Greater monstrosity never mingled with the Æsir's sons
—you, dairymaid, are all dung-spattered.

Then Þórr strode up and said:

Þórr said:

Hold your tongue, unmanly imp!
From you my mighty hammer,
Miðllnir, shall take your talk away!
That cliff-face on your shoulders
I shall strike off your neck and that will be the last of your life!

Loki said:

Here's Earth's offspring made his entrance now

In the prose before stanza 53 Sif has been omitted. The scribe has noticed this and put omission marks after gecc. He probably added the name in the margin, but it has been cut away. 53/6 -lausa] læsö R 57/3 fyrnema] fýr- R could also be read fyrir-, see JH textual note ad loc. The shorter form seems more appropriate to the heavy Lokasenna line (cf. Skm 34/5, 6 where fyrir- seems preferable rhythmically).

—hví þrasir þú svá, Þórr?
En þá þorir þú ekki,
er þú skalt við úlfinn vega,
ok svelgr hann allan Sigföður!

Þórr kvað:

59 Þegi þú, rög vættr!
Þér skal minn þrúðhamarr,
Miðllnir, mál fyrnema!
Upp ek þér verp
ok á austrvega—
síðan þik mangi sér.

Loki kvað:

60 Austrförum þínom
skaltu aldregi
segja seggiom frá,
sízt í hanska þumlungi
hnúkðir þú, einheri, ok þóttiska þú þá Þórr vera!

Þórr kvað:

61 Þegi þú, rög vættr!
Þér skal minn þrúðhamarr,
Miðllnir, mál fyrnema!
Hendi inni hægri
drep ek þik Hrungrnis bana, svá at þér brotnar beina hvat!

Loki kvað:

62 Lifa ætla ek mér langan aldr,
þóttu hætir hamri mér.

Skarpar álar þóttu þér Skrýmis vera,
ok máttira þú þá nesti ná,

ok svalt þú þá hungri heill!

—why do you threaten so, Þórr?
But then you won't dare to when you have to duel with the Wolf and he's swallowing Victory Sire whole!

Þórr said:

Hold your tongue, unmanly imp!
From you my mighty hammer,
Miðllnir, shall take your talk away!
Up I shall fling you and into the east—
and then not a soul will see you again.

Loki said:

Those eastern travels of yours you must not ever tell men the tale of,
because in a glove's thumb
you grovelled, great champion, and then you did not think you were Þórr!

Þórr said:

Hold your tongue, unmanly imp!
From you my mighty hammer,
Miðllnir, shall take your talk away!
With my right hand
I'll smite you with Hrungrnir's Bane, so that every bone in you will break!

Loki said:

For myself, I mean to live
a long life, even though you harass me with your hammer.

Stubborn were the straps of Skrýmir, it seemed to you, and you could not then reach your rations—

and so in perfect health you were dying of hunger!

59/1 Þegi — fyrnema] abbreviated Þegi þ. r. v. þ: R 60/6 þóttiska] þótis | ca, ca erased by a later hand R 61/1-3 Þegi — fyrnema] abbreviated Þegi þ. r. v: R

Þórr kvað:

63 Þegi þú, rög vættr!
Þér skal minn þrúðhamarr,
Miðllnir, mál fyrnema!
Hrungrnis bani
mun þér í hel koma
fyr nágrindr neðan!

Loki kvað:

64 Kvað ek fyr ásom,
kvað ek fyr ása sonom,
þaz mik hvatti hugr—
en fyr þér einom
mun ek út ganga,
þvíat ek veit at þú vegr.

65 Ql gærðir þú, Ægir, en þú aldri munt
síðan sumbl um gæra.
Eiga þín ǫll,
er hér inni er,
leiki yfir logi,
ok brenni þér á baki!

Þórr said:

Hold your tongue, unmanly imp!
From you my mighty hammer,
Miðllnir, shall take your talk away!
Hrungrnir's Bane
will bring you to Hel down below the corpse pens!

Loki said:

I have uttered before the Æsir,
I have uttered before the Æsir's sons, what my spirit spurred me to—but only for you will I go out,
because I know you kill.

You brewed ale, Ægir,
but you will never again
after this furnish a feast.
All your wealth
that's here within—let flame flicker over it, let it blaze on your back!

Frá Loka

En eptir þetta falz Loki í Fránangrs forsi í lax líki. Þar tóko æsir hann. Hann var bundinn með þormom sonar [síns] Nara. En Narfi sonr hans varð at vargi. Skaði tók eitorm ok festi upp yfir annlit Loka; draup þar ór eitr. Sigyn kona Loka sat þar ok helt munnlaug undir eitrit. En er munnlaugin var full, bar hón út eitrit; en meðan draup eitrit á Loka. Þá kiptiz hann svá hart við, at þaðan af skalf iðrð ǫll; þat ero nú kallaðir landskiá[l]ptar.

Of Loki

After that Loki hid himself in Fránangr's Fall, in the shape of a salmon. The Æsir caught him there. He was tied with the entrails of his own son Nari. But his son Narfi became a wolf. Skaði took a poisonous serpent and fastened it up above Loki's face, and there the poison dripped out of it. Sigyn, Loki's wife, sat there and held a basin under the poison. But when the basin was full, she carried the poison out, and in the meanwhile the poison dripped on Loki. Then he jerked so violently at it, that all the earth shook because of it. That is now called earthquakes.

63/1-3 Þegi — fyrnema] abbreviated Þegi þ. r. v. þ: R

Lokasenna and Gylfaginning (SnE 27)

To give poetic authority to his assertion of the prophetic gifts of Frigg, Snorri concocts a stanza from three stanzas of Lokasenna:

Ǽrr ertu, Loki, ok ǽrviti—
hví né legskaðu, Loki?
Ǽrlǫg Frigg
hygg ek at ǫll viti,
þótt hón siálfgi segi.

Ostensibly Óðinn is here castigating Loki: Ǽrr ertu, Loki, / ok ǽrviti (Lks 21/1–2, cf. 47/1–2: Ǽrr ertu, Loki, / svá at þú ert ǽrviti), and trying to suppress him into silence: hví né legskapu, Loki? (Lks 47/3, with a variant probably of Snorri's making, legsk, 'lie down', 'desist'), because Loki in his rudeness and folly is undervaluing the wisdom of Frigg: Ǽrlǫg Frigg / hygg ek at ǫll viti, / þótt hón siálfgi segi (Lks 29/4–6). Snorri has cleverly chosen lines that avoid reference to the situation of Loki's senna. I would say that the stanza in SnE was 'fabricated' rather than 'muddled' (cf. Gunnell (b), 247).

The only SnE MS. variants of interest for the text of Lokasenna are (a) the addition of nú after ertu in line 1 (W, U), since this might be relevant to the situation in Lokasenna, but not to the context in SnE, and omitted by Snorri on that account; nú occurs only twice in the first line of a stanza in the full poem, however (36/1, 53/1); (b) the W reading lezkattu in line 3, as in the full poem. As often, W seems to have access to a better text than other SnE MSS.

INTRODUCTION

1. Lokasenna and the Cycle of Ambrosia

Dumézil has traced an Indo-European cycle of legends which has its clearest exemplification in Indian and Norse texts.¹ First, the gods wish to make a drink that will give them immortality: this is to be created in the ocean. In Indian texts it will be churned from the 'sea of milk', which is the ocean. In Norse (Hymiskviða) it will be brewed as ale by the lord of the ocean, Ægir (this ale is never stated to be a drink of immortality in Norse).² In both Indian and Norse the obtaining of the implements for churning or brewing cause elaborate problems: an uprooted mountain is required for churning the sea, a vast cauldron must be obtained from the formidable giant Hymir for brewing the ale. Then, when amṛta/soma and ǫl are ready to drink, both Indian and Norse traditions preserve two variant stories of attempts by the gods' enemies to get the drink for themselves. In Indian:

1. A demon, Rāhu, insinuates himself in disguise into the gods' feast and is in the act of swallowing a mouthful of soma when the sun and moon see him and cry out; Viṣṇu beheads Rāhu with his discus. The demonic head, already immortal by its drink, then begins a perpetual pursuit of sun and moon, but, being bodiless, can only cause them brief eclipses as it swallows them. This story is an antecedent of Lokasenna.

2. The demons succeed in stealing the soma and offer to barter it for the glorious goddess Lakṣmī. Viṣṇu himself assumes the form of Lakṣmī and goes to the demons. Filled with love, they give her the soma. Viṣṇu throws off his disguise and slaughters them with his discus. This story is an antecedent of Þrymskviða, though in the Norse poem the theme has broken away from the cycle of the drink of immortality, in that the salvation of gods and men from death is no longer linked with that drink, but with the defending hammer of Þórr.³

Of the three Norse parallels to incidents in this archaic cycle, Lokasenna appears to have been developed most profoundly. The intruder at the feast is not of an enemy rival race, demon or giant, but one of the Æsir themselves, blood-brother to Óðinn, the highest god. He insists on a place at the feast because that is where he belongs. Because he belongs, he can criticize from within. And so he does, with an inventive virulence that makes those around him think him mad or drunk. But what he has drunk does not make him celebrate immortality. He rejoices rather in malediction and the forecast of universal destruction, not out of moral conviction, but to relieve his furious brain in a brilliant exhibition of spleen. The cause of his first expulsion from the feast, though not told in the poem, is cleverly devised to convey his reckless disgust at the trivial courtesies of the divine life—praising the servants indeed—when the whole pantheon, as he will proceed to demonstrate, is rotten to the core.

¹ Dumézil (a). For relevance to Lks see esp. 1–60.

² In the light of Dumézil's work it seems likely that ǫl, 'ale', and the runic alu, usually taken to signify 'good fortune', 'felicity', are indeed etymologically identical.

³ See UD (i), 678–80.

II. Loki's Satire

A very early example of hostile satire of divine tradition is the invective of Gilgamesh against Ishtar, when he itemizes all her 'stinking deeds' (as she herself puts it; see commentary to Lks 30/4–6). We need not always suppose a breakdown of religious faith when we encounter satire of the gods. It will be older than any record of it: an ancient shout of revolt against conformity and reverence; a deeply impudent impulse recognized and ritualized in the saturnalia and satiric customs to be found in most societies, expressed at licensed moments, and—by recognition—intended to strengthen the religion, not to break it. When Loki mocks the gods, he does not mock their divinity, he mocks the human characteristics they have acquired through the millennia of being handled by human hands. He does not say to Óðinn: 'That mead you stole from Suttungr is totally ineffectual', or to Freyja: 'You can't really raise the dead to life by your seiðr', or to Freyr: 'Your fields are always blighted'. He jeers at them for transvestism, incest, cowardice, or just bad luck, and distorts their legends outrageously.

These distortions of 'truth' are not harmless fun. They are damaging slanders and the gods fear them: they infect their felicity, their heill. In Greek magical papyri slander of the gods is used as a source of magical power.⁴ To attract to you a woman you desire, you must attribute to her slanderous statements about the gods. The gods are deeply offended by slander, and a love-spell betraying such slander will rouse 'an irrepressible daimon who acts in response to slander against various divine beings'. The daimon will avenge the maligned god by driving the woman to seek your house at once and offer you her love. The slander she is to be accused of may be sacrilege 'of a most impertinent and insulting nature. Iaō [creator of the cosmos] did not really create woman from man but from himself and as a result has become an Adamic monstrosity feminized to the point where he has no ribs at all'. Or 'Adōnai [greatest of gods] did not really triumph over the man Jacob. What actually happened is that Jacob overturned Adōnai in the wrestling match in which God had to ask Jacob for release and consequently would not tell Jacob his name'.

⁴ Moke 127–34. The divine names in the spells indicate the blend of traditions—Greek, Jewish, Egyptian—that have gone to their making.

These Greek spells illuminate the fear that transfixes the gods as they feel the fork of Loki's devilish tongue. It is not simply that Ægir's hall is hallowed and the feast sacral: it is the dread that elemental beings—daimones, vættir—are near who could be provoked by Loki's words to visit the gods' deeds upon them.⁵ Accusations do not have to be true before the daimones are provoked: the spoken word, the calumny alone, is enough. As Frigg implores Óðinn and Loki: 'Do not tell to anyone what you did in the past, keep your old destiny far behind you' (25). And even if no words are spoken, the deeds are still there, known to the mind. 'Our deeds are like children that are born to us; they live and act apart from our own will. Nay, children may be strangled, but deeds never: they have an indestructible life both in and out of our consciousness.'⁶ Do the gods fear their guilt? They do not deny the accusations.

If we examine their deeds, however, what really are they guilty of? They cannot be blamed, as the Greek gods are by Hesiod, for crushing mankind with poverty and slavery. They do not swallow their sons or assassinate their fathers. Loki hates them, not for any sins, but for his own pleasure, like a Thersites, or an Iago, and for the superiority hate gives him. He exposes the sexualities of the Vanir deities, but, as Njǫrðr says (33), does it matter if the ladies have a boy-friend or two? And the gods themselves laugh when they surprise Freyr and Freyja in bed (32). The deeds of Loki and Óðinn í árdaga that strike Frigg with such fear (25) show them as comic figures—Loki having babies could be as amusing as the accouchement of Zeus as told by Lucian; old Óðinn swaying with his drum like a vplva entranced would raise a laugh as Cadmus and Tiresias do in their elderly inebriated imitation of Dionysiac dance in the Bacchae. The unfair travesties of archaic religious concepts—brother and sister as married gods (32), ritual wedding nights with both god and husband in bed (26)—are turned to laughter. There are jokes about gods who are symbols of non-human things; so Njǫrðr, the ocean, is mocked as a urine-trough into which the rivers trickle as giantesses' piss, and Heimdallr, the world's guardian tree with the fertility of the earth flowing at its roots, becomes a wretched sentry with dirty breeches. So we get sexual jokes and scatological jokes, and also another popular type of joke, the schadenfreude joke—‘May I remind you of your right hand, Týr, the one the wolf bit off?’ Such jokes may grow crueller on provocation: when Skaði foretells that Loki will be bound by the intestines of his own son, Loki swiftly assures her that he enjoyed every minute of her father’s death when he and the gods tore him to pieces with their hands. And she hates him for it (49–51). When Frigg bitterly wishes Baldr back to fight him for his insults (27), Loki swaggers affectedly—does she really want to know more of the frightful things he has done? ‘Well, it’s my fault that Baldr isn’t here, you know!’ Frigg has no answer. There is folly to be denounced—to give your sword to get a girl (42)—and poor judgement, or bias—to let the weaker warrior win (22). Yet none of Loki’s accusations relate to divine crimes that Prometheus would endure chains and torture to protest against.

⁵ The role of slander in the love-spells and in Lks is of course not the same; for the purpose of the love-spells the daimones are avengers of the gods' good name, but I use the spells as a vivid illustration of the rousing of punitive spirits by calumny. I would suppose the role of slander in the love-spells to be a secondary use of a tradition of slander against divinities, but I have not yet been able to investigate this problem with expert guidance.

⁶ George Eliot, Romola ch. 16.

There is no sincere moral fervour in the poem, no evidence that the poet was attempting ‘to castigate the moral degeneration or lack of religious belief in his own time, or even to do the opposite, to compose a critique of the mythology of ancient times, packed with improper tales and immoral adventures’—possibilities that Dumézil tentatively envisages.⁷ Is an audience meant, in all earnestness, to be outraged by the lechery of the goddesses that Loki so censoriously reveals, when he also salaciously boasts that he has slept with three of them himself (40, 52, 54)? Using and twisting well-known material, the poet is spinning satiric repartee at high speed, turning Loki now against this deity, now against that, like a swordsman beset on all sides: a bravura performance in which not a thrust or a phrase falters. He makes Loki terrifying by the force of his lewdness and his lies, and the gods his victims, tied by taboos, by the fear of sacrilege, and—above all—by the fatal oath of blood-brotherhood that Óðinn must have sworn. So Loki and his tongue are free to shatter the other, ever-present, taboos on calumny and evil speech. He is not afraid of the hidden future, or the goddesses who know it (21, 29); he is happy to curse the whole feast and its hall and its holder into the ultimate conflagration (65). Such is his strength that with every adversary he has the last word: all those he attacks seem to withdraw spinelessly before him. Only Þórr can make him withdraw, by physical force, not wit. Had the poet been tracing a grave moral theme, with Loki as its mouthpiece, would he have ended his poem with the delightful escapade of Loki darting from under the vast hammer as Þórr heavily trudges round in pursuit of him, repeating the same refrain each time he has missed the skipping figure and tries again? Þórr gives no great impression of intelligence here, as Loki vividly itemizes all Þórr’s ludicrous discomfitures at the hands of his own giant namesake, Útgarða-Loki (59–62). It is Loki’s last mockery of the gods to run rings round their great protector. The poet conspires with him by giving Þórr—‘Earth’s Boy’ indeed—the most lumbering poetry in the poem.

⁷ Dumézil (a), 56–7.

Loki’s curse (65), and indeed his whole verbal attack upon the gods, has grown no doubt from the tradition that he will become one of the giant enemies of the gods at Ragnarøk (Völuspá 48). In Lokasenna we can see him, as it were, in transition, still claiming blood-brotherhood with Óðinn and his right to the gambansumbl, yet at the same time delivering himself of a divine ‘misanthropy’, baring before the gods and their sons just what his mind spurred him to (64): a radical desire for their destruction. The malevolent end makes real all the fear in the poem.

Dumézil noted that a variant of the second episode of the Cycle of Ambrosia, the stealing of the drink of immortality by the demons/giants, occurs in the tale of the giant Hrungnir’s visit to Ásgarðr, preserved only in the prose of Skáldskaparmál (SnE 101).⁸ In Þórr’s absence the gods invite the giant to their table; he gets very drunk, wants to transport Valhöll to Jötunheimar, destroy Ásgarðr, kill all the gods and goddesses, except Freyja and Sif, whom he will take home with him; and he will drink all their ale himself. The gods now decide it is time to summon Þórr, who comes at once, with hammer raised, and a duel is arranged (see Haustlög 14–18). Hrungnir, lording it at the gods’ feast before Þórr comes, must have been a model for Loki in Lokasenna. The adoption of Loki in place of Hrungnir at once transforms the old burlesque menace of the giant ‘from outside’ into the ‘last judgement’ of a hostile accuser ‘from within’. The comic intention of the old burlesque is not lost in the new satire, because Loki is a brilliant clown; but, traditionally, temperamentally, the clown can also be the outsider, who hates his role, and those he plays it for.

III. The Popular Game of Satire and the Origins of Lokasenna

Carlo Levi describes a game of satire and insult in Lucania, southern Italy, which illuminates Lokasenna.⁹ It is called Passatella . . . a particular favourite among the peasants. On long winter evenings and holidays they play it for hours in the taverns. It often ends in violence. . . . Passatella is not so much a game as a peasant tournament of oratory, where interminable speeches reveal in veiled terms a vast amount of repressed rancour, hate, and rivalry. A brief session with the cards determines a winner, who is then the King of the passatella, and his assistant. The King holds sway over the wine, for which all the players have paid their share, and he fills the glasses or leaves them empty according to his fancy. His assistant holds the glasses out to be filled and has veto powers, that is, he can prevent the would-be drinker from downing his wine.

⁸ Dumézil (a), 58.

⁹ Levi (1965) 190, trans. 177.

The King and his assistant alike must justify both their choices and their vetoes, and this they do in the form of a cross-examination carried out in long speeches, replete with irony and concealed passion. Sometimes the game has an innocent character and does not extend beyond the pleasantry of piling up all the drinks on one man who is notoriously unable to hold them, or denying them to the keenest drinker at the table. But more often the arguments proffered by the King and his assistant reflect the feuds and conflicting interests of the players, expressed with all the slowness, roundabout ways, astuteness, mistrust, and deep conviction characteristic of the peasants. Cards and bottles of wine alternate for hours on end, until tempers boil from the effect of drink and heat and the rekindling of smouldering passions, which are in turn sharpened by vindictive words and yet lulled by drunkenness. Even if a fight does not develop, all those present are aware of the bitterness latent in what has been said during the exchange of veiled insults.

In Passatella each man may have the chance to be Loki, to polish his insults in soaring style and relish the freedom to utter 'what his mind spurred him to'. And there would be wine to loosen his tongue fearlessly.

In early Iceland too mockery and hostile raillery was a way of enlivening the hard—or boring—monotony of life. At Krossavík in Vápnafjörður in the early eleventh century (allegedly in the lifetime of Guðmundr inn ríki †1025)¹⁰ a young trouble-maker—with an attractive and forthright side to him—Boisterous Brandr—growing bored with two weeks of respectable behaviour, dutifully accompanying his farmer host everywhere, begins to stay on in the living-room after the farmer has gone to bed, and to initiate margs konar ertingar, 'railleries of a wide variety'. Erti is 'to mock, tease, provoke into enmity (by your remarks)'. People came from far and wide from the farms in the district, and Brandr's 'entertainment' made a great stir. His farmer host was left to drink in the evening with only one man for company, while everyone else, household and visitors (presumably bringing some victuals and drink with them), watched or joined in the fun. The game of gibes and raillery seems to have been organized in the form of mock lawsuits, because the women began to complain that 'the verdicts were tyrannously arrived at, because no defence they offered was accepted as valid, and they were not allowed to control their own procedures'. They bring their complaint to the farmer host, who blames Brandr and his sveitungar ('gang of young lads from the district') for bullying the women. Brandr promises reform and stays in bed when, the next night and the next, the people gather for the ribald þing. They have to depart again as there is no formaðr, 'convener', to open the Assembly, at heyja þing. As in Passatella, the sport of erting has its formalities. The saga writer claims that Brandr was the first to invent the 'Laws of the Syrpuping'. As Syrpa is a name signifying 'girl who cleans up the rubbish (sorþ)', we could suppose the

¹⁰ Vǫðu-Brands Þáttur 129–30, ch. 2.

Syrpuping to be a somewhat scurrilous make-believe Assembly to which fictitious cases were brought, rousing laughter by their witty improvisations and no doubt indelicacies—like many of Loki's arraignments. That women took part in these mock lawsuits hardly reflects normal Icelandic legal practice. Could it be the influence of the vivacious repartee of the mixed company in such dramatic mythology as Lokasenna that made women necessary participants in the Syrpuping, even if only as targets for teasing?

I have cited these two instances of popular satire as entertainment to show that quite sophisticated satire can develop as a social and psychological need in unlearned societies, especially if the mind has no other way of exerting its strength. Brandr's active mind was bored to extinction without the liveliness of other minds to kindle and be kindled by. I would suggest that there is no need to seek for the sources of Lokasenna in the Greek model of Lucian.¹¹ Temperamentally his satire and Loki's have little in common. The mocking dramas of the old gods—Lokasenna, Hárbarðs-lióð—must have grown up among the heathen Norse people, been cultivated at the great seasonal festivals at the nobler homes, where jarlar and hersir would gather vast supplies of grain to refresh their people with ale for several weeks.¹² What better setting for the birth of a Lokasenna with its gambansumbl? These popular dramas would no doubt be uncouth—like Hymiskviða—where their creators were rough amateurs, and fine-drawn—like Lokasenna—when expert skalds had control. Icelandic settlers would bring Norwegian festival customs with them, and during the centuries of transition to Christianity treasure and recreate their dramas as verbal heirlooms, polishing them and shaping them with familiarity long before they were written down. There is no evidence that Lokasenna could have been composed ex nihilo in the twelfth or thirteenth century in Iceland,¹³ since we cannot find any poetry there, satiric or otherwise, which may be dated in this period, that approaches Lokasenna in maturity of thought, style, or structure. Satiric verse from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries is not devoted to the behaviour of the old gods but to that of political enemies and unpopular neighbours whose petty scurrilities have few mythological reverberations.¹⁴

¹¹ See Schröder.

¹² The early Christian kings strove to suppress these great gatherings, knowing that they maintained old heathen traditions (cf. Hkr II. 194–8; Knytinga Saga 154, 160).

¹³ See Söderberg (c), 74–9.

¹⁴ See UD (h), 97–108 for a fuller presentation of the dating of Lks, particularly considering the antiquity of its mythological motifs. Söderberg (b) offers a valuable critique of the dating of Eddic verse. Before we can advance further in this field of research, on surer footing, we need a complete corpus of newly edited verse texts, including the lausavísur in the sagas.

COMMENTARY ON THE TEXT

Prose Prologue

line 1 Ægir: personification of ægir, 'ocean', loosely, as an elemental being, regarded as a giant (cf. Hym 2, etc.); etymologically related to Lat aqua, 'water', OE ēagor, 'sea'; IEW 14; Lks Introd 1.

Gymir: an ancient ON equivalent name for Ægir, the giant sea, but of less clear origin: possibly related to gómi, 'gums', and the notion of gaping jaws (AEW s.vv.; note the predatory pleasure implied in Ytal 25: ... austmarr / jǫfri sænskum / Gymis ljóð / at gamni kveðr, 'the eastern sea for the Swedish prince chants the Ocean Giant's song for joy' (after the Estonians have killed him); commentary to Vsp 3/7; in Skm 10/7–8 Gymir is a rapacious and fearsome giant.

line 2 sem nú er sagt: i.e. in the preceding poem in the MS., Hymiskviða. See Lks Introd 1.

line 7 Mart — álfa: the speakers Gefjun and Heimdallr have not been specified.

line 8 Fimafengr ok Elder, 'Nimble-provider/server' and 'Cook' (not a prose term; from elda, 'to heat, cook, with fire', eldr).

1/5 ǫlmálmom: light talk over the ale (which can prove fatally serious, cf. HHv 33/2–4: spinn muno verða / ǫlmál, Heðinn, / okkor beggia).

2/2 vígrisni: hap. leg.; vígrisinn adj., Guð II 29/3, Gríp 13/8, cannot be more precisely interpreted in the contexts than 'excellent in war', 'fine warrior'. The fem. abstract nouns risna, risni (indeclinable) are terms of high approbation implying 'dignity, magnanimity, generous standards of living', especially in hospitality (gestrisni); in verse mainly used of God and saints (LP). Etymological relationship with OE risne, gerisene (both adj. and noun), 'fitting', 'what is fitting, decorous' (also adv. gerisenlice, vb. gerisnian) would seem probable; there seems too little evidence to trace to a known stem. Some interpreters would render vígrisni as 'eagerness, zeal, for war', because risna often implies 'keenness', 'assiduity'; I have kept to a less active term, as I do not think the poet implies more than the gods' self-confidence and vanity at this moment (though the thought of the 'last battle' at Ragnarøk will be in the distance for them, as for the poet).

2/4 Ása ok álfa: see commentary to Vsp 49/1–2.

3/4 Oll ok áfo: I have kept this reading (see textual note; also SG) to maintain the parallel with the two nouns in 4/4, because I doubt whether the miswriting in the MS. would have occurred if there had not been a parallel. Oll does not occur elsewhere in ON texts; it occurs a few times in OE: on oll and on edwīt, 'in contempt and scorn' (Napier (a), no. 2000), mid olle, 'with mockery, sarcasm' (Wulfstan (a), 273; Ælfric, Lives of the Saints no. 9, line 72); cf. also MED s.v. ollen vb., 'to scorn, contemn'. Oll could be a colloquial term passing from one language to another without much record. No etymology has so far been determined. We may note that 38/3 til, 'good', is also OE, hap. leg. in ON.

Karlsson (b), 257–66, acutely, but differently, solves MS. 'ioll 7 afo' as í ǫllok áfo, 'at the ale-ending, when the ale-drinking has come to an end, accusations/disgrace [I'll bring upon the Æsir's sons]'. Stefán gives a valuable analysis of the occurrences of áfa and its various senses in Icelandic tradition. See also commentary to Am 1/1 on ófo.

6/1–3 Pyrstr — veg: a parodistic imitation of Óðinn's obsequious entry into Vafþrúðnir's hall (Vafþ 8).

7/2 þrungrin goð: I picture the gods swelling with rage, but holding back their furious words with lips firmly pressed together, to keep the peace.

8/1–8 Bragi is pointedly chosen to refuse Loki a place at the feast, not only as spokesman for the gods, but because, in a famous poem, Hákonarmál, he so warmly welcomes Hákon to drink with the Æsir in amity: Einherja grið / skalt þú allra hafa. / Þigg þú at ǫsum ǫll 'From all the champions you shall have a pledge of peace—accept from the Æsir their ale!' (stanza 16). In Eiríksmál 4 (the later poem, as von See (b) has clearly shown), Bragi is somewhat tartly reproved by Óðinn for speaking foolishly (Heimsku mæla . . . skalat þú enn horski Bragi, Fagrsk 78); perhaps Bragi's reputation in later tradition has suffered from his ignominious image in Lks. Bragi as the 'best of skalds' (Grím 44) may be among the gods as the chosen apotheosis of a great eulogist—such as Bragi Boddason—and court þulr (as the heathen King Eiríkr of Sweden was chosen to be unus de numero deorum according to Rimbert 62; AR §§ 312, 313, 513).

gambansumbl: hap. leg.; see commentary to Skm 32/3. Sumbl may be used of the drink itself as well as of the feast in general (Alv 34, Háv 110, Hál 15), its potency being sacral as well as realistic (cf. Doht).

9/3 blendom blóði saman: no other source tells us this; it is a clever way of expressing the link between the two gods and the identity of their eccentric behaviour (cf. Óðinn as Þölverkr, SnE 84–5, Háv 109). See AR Index s.v. Blutsbrüderschaft.

10/1 Víðarr: Óðinn's loathing of Loki, and of his own predicament, at this moment finds expression in his choice of Víðarr to serve Loki with ale. The scene of Víðarr's killing of the wolf (Vsp 52) is here imposed on the scene in Ægir's hall.

10/5 lastastofom: on the fear of calumny see Lks Introd 11.

11/1–2 Heilir — ásynior: an unctuous citation of Sigdrífa's devout words (Sigrdr 4/1–2).

11/5–6 sitr . . . bekkiom á: perhaps because Bragi has refused him a seat, Loki harps on the theme of Bragi ‘seated’ (15/1, 3).

12/3 baugi could mean ‘gift’, ‘money’ in general (see LP s.v. baugr § 1), as well as a more lordly ‘ring’ (which perhaps accords better with mar ok mæki, 12/1, and armbauga, 13/1).

13/1 Íós: for alliteration I have used in the translation the popular ME term for ‘horse’ (MED s.v. baiard).

13/6–7 við víg — við skot: as we know so little of Bragi, we can only suppose that Loki implies that as a poet and orator Bragi composes about battles, but never himself enters them (cf. Hallfreðr vandræðaskáld’s Óláfsdrápa, an erfiðrápa for Óláfr Tryggvason, which is a detailed picture of the king’s last battle, as participants related it to him, though he himself was far away—ulfa sultar . . . þverri stóðk ferri, ‘I was placed far from the hero, diminisher of the wolf’s hunger’ (stanza 27); similarly Þormóðr Bersason composed from report—hefk . . . sann spurt; frák—verses on his fosterbrother’s fights (Þórgeirsdrápa 7, 13; cf. Fóst 207–10).

14/6 lútt — lygi: for lútt adjectivally used for lítit (LP s.v. lútt), cf. lútt vas þat til þrætu, ‘small subject was that for dispute’, Fóst 139, vísa 3/7.

15/1 sessi: I am assuming that the benches would be festively piled with cushions (as in Njál 290, ch. 116).

15/6 Hyggz — fyrir: in this compact remark Loki says in several ways that Bragi is a coward because he thinks of reasons for not acting, rather than acts (e.g. ‘no brave man thinks ahead, takes anything into consideration, is cautious’), but the paramount sense must relate to the precise reason that Bragi has given for his inaction, namely, refusal to violate the sanctuary of Ægir’s hall. So Loki is saying, ‘If you were really valiant, you would not see that as an obstacle’: in other words he is warmly encouraging a sacrilege. After all, has he not himself performed such a sacrilege in killing Fimafengr, and survived? For other poetic uses of fyrir with the sense ‘as a hindrance to’ see LP s.v. fyr, fyrir B § 4.

16/2–3 barna sifjar — óskmaga: I am not sure that I have understood the reference here. In the poem both Bragi and Loki are called áss (11/4, 19/1, 33/4). Iðunn cannot therefore be asking Bragi not to start a racist war between sons-of-the-blood and adopted sons by quarrelling with Loki. She is conjuring Bragi by the force of the two ties of kinship—sifjar—that hold the society of Ásgarðr together, its begotten children and its adopted children linked as one family, not to launch into calumnies against Loki. She emphasizes the children, þörn, megir, because of the future that is at stake if Ásgarðr is torn with hatred. See the valuable notes of SG and Söderberg (a), 69–70. Iðunn’s instinct for peace and the children’s future is in keeping with her nature as goddess of renewal and prosperity, yet there is no supporting evidence in ON pre-Christian poetry for the implication in Lks 16/2–3 that the gods had a kinship class of adopted sons called óskmegir, ‘beloved sons’.

Ósk-Rán in Ragnr 8 describes Hildr as a bloodthirsty ‘goddess’ who desires (Ósk-) the drying-out of veins. (The reading óskkván in Göppormr sindri is dismissed in Hkr 1. 180–1). In Gylfaginning (SnE 27) it is said that Óðinn’s óskasynir are all those who fall in battle, and that in Valhöll these are called Einherjar. This statement follows immediately after a composite citation from Lks 21, 29, 47 (see the note on Lokasenna and Gylfaginning after the text of the poem); Snorri could well have had Lks 16/3 óskmaga in mind when he turned the Einherjar into óskasynir. By Snorri’s day the Christian use of ósk- to denote adopted sons or the beloved sons of God must have been common (see Fritzner s.vv. óskasonr, ósk-barn, -berni, -mær, -mogr). Óski is, however, an Óðinn-name listed in Grim 49/8, and we cannot rule out the possibility that it was a heathen tradition of heroes and valkyries, dear to Óski (perhaps indeed giving Óðinn this name), which stimulated Christian practice and later faded from record. See Kuhn (b), 1–4.

17/4–6 súztu — bróðurbani: Loki is upbraiding Iðunn for a mythological situation in which she found herself. As goddess of the constantly renewed spring of life (see Haustr 9; commentary to Skm 19–20), Iðunn belongs to the same mythologem as the Vanir. They took as consort their brother or sister. If this marital custom applied to Iðunn, the husband who was killed in the seasonal contest for possession of her would be her brother, and the winner of her, her bróðurbani. Another Gmc goddess with close affinity to the Vanir, the Nerthus described by Tacitus, Germ xl, bathed ritually before she withdrew to her sanctuary. For the same ritual reason Iðunn would be beautifully bathed before embracing her new destined husband; cf. the ritual bathing of Inanna (Leick 101):

‘My lady bathes (her) pure lap,
She bathes for the lap of the king, . . .
The pure Inanna washes with soap,
She sprinkles cedar oil on the ground . . .’

(for fuller analysis see Dronke (h), 98–101, from which I have briefly quoted here).

The situation Loki castigates here in relation to Iðunn cannot be relevant to Bragi. He has just been mocked for martial cowardice; he cannot now be seen as the May-Queen-winning champion. The poet does not relate him to this mythologem, and we do not need to (even though AR §§ 313, 512 notes possible archaic links between Bragi and the hero- and fertility-cults). Pragmatic interpretation can do no more than say that Iðunn had an amorous dilemma—now best forgotten—before she married Bragi. Their alliance in Lks is likely to be one of dramatic convenience, bringing together actors without traditional partners, but with legends that the poet wished to satirize.

19/4 Lopzki þat veit: i.e. gen. of Loptr (Loki) elided with eigi, etc. DH have the neatest interpretation here: ‘Deutet das nicht auf Loki?’ i.e. ‘is it not a sign, known characteristic, of Loki?’ (cf. LP s.v. vita § 4 with gen.; Fritzner s.v. vita §§ 4, 5). I have not found parallels for the interrogative word-order of the text—I assume veit þat ekki would be normal—but parallels with enclitic negative might well be rare.

19/5 leikinn: adj. ‘fond of amusements, jests’ (Flat 1. 368: Óláfr konungr [Tryggvason] var allra manna glaðastr ok leikinn mjök).

19/6 hann — fría: in some tales Loki is indeed a trusted and invaluable companion (in Þrym; in Þórr's journey to Útgarða-Loki; in his success in making the irate Skaði laugh; SnE 54, 81). In this stanza there is a hint of a Thersites role for Loki, as professional fool and licensed railer. As Ajax's fool, Thersites 'is a privileged man', but also a 'damnable box of envy' who curses his masters with his last words in the play: 'A burning devil take them!' (Troilus and Cressida II. iii. 61, v. i. 29, v. ii. 196).

fiqrg: as a heiti for the gods found only here; cf. fiarghús, 'temple', Akv 40/8 and commentary.

20/1–8 Gefjun, like Iðunn, will have been brought into Loki's senna, because there was a myth about her that could be travestied. Gefjun's myth has, I think, been correctly identified by North (a), 217–24. It is the story of the rescue of Freyja's necklace/girdle/jewel out of Loki's thieving hands by Heimdallr in an oceanic fight in which both contestants take the shape of seals. This is in outline the version in Húsdr and in Snorri's prose report of stanzas he does not cite (SnE 98–100). In Haustl 9 Loki is called 'thief of the girdle of Brisingr's gods'. Snorri lists among Heimdallr's kennings 'seeker of the necklace of Freyja' (mensækir Freyju), and refers always to her Brisingamen. In Húsdr the contested treasure is called 'gleaming kidney of the sea' (hafnýra fǫgru; see Meaney (a); UD (i), 669–70). Already we have three variants for the contested treasure: (a) the archetypal necklace of the mother goddess (early depicted on Megalithic images; Levy Fig. 67, 68), (b) the girdle, and (c) the kidney-shaped sea-bean, both (b) and (c) talismans of childbirth in ON. We may well expect variants in other aspects of the myth also.

Though in no ON text is the necklace of Freyja expressly said to be a symbol of the glorious fertility that she brings to the earth, the identification of Earth's greenery with Earth's jewellery is made explicitly in a Mesopotamian poem (Leick 18):

The great Earth (Ki) made herself glorious, her body flourished with greenery.

Wide Earth put on silver metal and lapis-lazuli ornaments,

Adorned herself with diorite, calcedony, cornelian and diamonds.

It is not stated in any text that Heimdallr restored the stolen necklace to Freyja. That scene appears only in the story of Gefjun that Loki tells. The 'blond boy'—sveinn inn hvíti—is readily identifiable with Heimdallr hvítastr ása (Þrym 15/2), hvíti áss (SnE 32; cf. Vsp 19/3–4). And the sigli he gave Gefjun is the necklace saved from the sea, and from Loki. The placing of Gefjun in the role of Freyja could relate to an old identity of the two goddesses. Freyja has many names (SnE 38), including Mardöll, 'Tree of the Sea', and Gefn, 'Giver', a name identical in form with OE geofon, 'ocean'. Gefjun also relates to the stem gef-, 'give'. The sea is a rich giver, and Njörðr, its god, is proverbially wealthy. For discussion and documentation see North, (a), 217–24; AR § 555.

sveinn inn hvíti: Loki makes his allusion to Heimdallr's 'whiteness' derogatory, 'blond boy' suggesting effeminacy, cowardice (cf. Bjarn 140, vísa 3/1 (b); Viga-Glúm 62, n. 1).

sigli: in ON only here and in Sigsk 49 (also of an ornament for a woman), probably a borrowing from OE sigle, which occurs four times in Beowulf (once of the necklace Brōsinga mene) and is usually related to OE sigel, 'sun', the name of the S-rune (cf. also Sigelhearna, 'sun-blackened one', i.e. Ethiopian, sigeltorht, 'sun-bright'). Sigli/sigle would probably signify a circular ornament, necklace, torque, or brooch (cf. Lat. lunula, 'round, Moon-like ornament', glossed in OHG as sigilla, AEW s.v. sigli 1). The circular sigli, representing the Brisingamen, representing the fertile earth, is the equivalent of the earth pulled by plough through the ocean by Gefjun to form Sjøælland. Bragi calls that earth djúpröðull, 'roundel, wheel, sun (röðull) of the deep (djúp)' (SnE 8; UD (g), 37; commentary to Skm 4/4). The precious djúpröðull was also a gift to Gefjun for her sexual favours: at launum skemtunar sinnar.

lagðir lær yfir: a coarser variant of 17/4–5: arma þína lagðir (cf. Háv 108/6), designed to shock the hearers into laughter by its unexpected bluntness.

21/4–6 Gefjun will have powers of foresight (like Frigg, 29/4–6) because she too inhabits the underwater realm (see commentary to Vsp 20/3). We may note that Rán, wife of Ægir/Gymir, is called Gymis vqlva, 'Ocean's sibyl', by Hofgarða-Refr, Skjald B I. 296.

22/4–6 Most notoriously Óðinn punished the valkyrie Sigrdrífa for killing the warrior to whom he had promised victory; by rights he should no doubt have given the victory to her (Sigrdr prose following stanza 4; cf. Vqls ch. 21). Óðinn's intervention in Sigmundr's last battle (Vqls ch. 11) might also come under Loki's criticism. In Eiríksmál 6 Óðinn is asked accusingly why he robbed Eiríkr of victory, though so valiant: the answer is, he will need him at Ragnarök (cf. Vsp 50/7). Hákon góði resents the injustice of his death at the moment of victory: 'We deserved better of the gods' (Hákonarmál 12).

23/4–8 Óðinn now introduces a variation in riposte and in metre: suppose I did do what you say, look how you have behaved! And he drags up from the past a fantastic sex-change of Loki's in the underworld—presumably among the giants—about which we have no other sources. The poet might be inventing freely here, but certain formal considerations suggest that he could be drawing on older traditions. The eight years of Loki's sojourn below is a traditional period of alienation (cf. Vkv 3) or of sacral interludes (as in the great sacrificial festivals at Uppsala, cf. commentary to Vsp 19/2). In other texts Loki is said to bear offspring: a foal by the giant builder's stallion Svaðilfari (SnE 46–7; Hynnl 41), and, from eating the half-roasted heart of an evil woman, he becomes pregnant with the mother of all witches (Hynnl 41). Should we interpret 23/6, as 'a milch-cow and a woman' or as 'milking cows and a woman'? Is Loki here re-enacting the primordial role of the cow Auðumla, who fed the first giant Ymir (SnE 13), but re-enacting it in the underworld, for some mythological parody? I have for the translation assumed that Óðinn is describing an ordinary woman's life—milking cows and bearing children—but in the underworld (though this may well not be the poet's intention). As a trickster figure Loki can cross all the conventional boundaries of society and sex (see de Vries (b) chs.

10, 12). It is prohibited in the Norwegian laws to say that a man is 'a woman every ninth night', or that he has borne children, been used as a woman, or is a mare, bitch (or any other female animal), or whore (NGL 1. 57, 70; SG). Icelandic laws give a man the right to kill any man who calls him effeminate or a passive homosexual (the prohibited terms being ragr/argr, stroðinn, sorðinn; Grágas II. 392-3; Almqvist (a) I. 62-6).

24/1-6 Loki in return derides Óðinn as one of those seiðmenn who dress up as women and congregate to perform seiðr (especially, perhaps, at festival seasons at the homes of rich rulers; cf. Hkr I. 42-3, 138-9). Our knowledge of these seiðmenn is scanty. Tacitus, Germ xliii, records a priest in woman's costume (muliebri ornatu) officiating in a sacred grove among the East Gmc Nahanarvali (cf. AR § 498). We may suppose the seiðmenn's cult to be not unlike that of the 'lower-class, itinerant eunuch priests of Cybele', who wore women's clothes, consorted with male prostitutes, and claimed mystic knowledge (see P. Dronke (i), 9-10, nn. 118-19, on the Greek Iolaus fragment, 2 c. AD, which gives valuable insights into this cult; see Iolaus in Bibliography for editions). On seiðr see commentary to Vsp 22/5. In placing Óðinn as a vplva on an island the poet may be imitating HH I 37.

Sámseyio í: presumably modern Samsø, north of Fyn, though why this island (famous for the battle in which Angantýr was killed, and where his haunted grave-mound was visited by his daughter; Heiðr ch. 3) should be the place of Óðinn's seiðr, I do not know. A connection with ON sámskr, 'Lappish' (Lappish sabme) would seem more appropriate (on Óðinn's paternity of Sæmingr and his links with the far north, see Davidson 57-62).

vétt: probably an older form of vætt neut., '(raised) lid on a coffer' (see Fritzner s.v.). I have followed Strömbäck 22-5, whose evidence that Lappish magicians used tub- or bucket-lids, with a handle, as well as drums, seems excellent. If the vétt was a poorer style of instrument, that would suit Loki's scornful tone well. For etymology see AEW s.v. vætt 2. Vétt may also be identical with vítt (see commentary to Vsp 22/4).

Vitka líki: Loki is, no doubt, alluding to Óðinn's journey to the Ruthenians (? in Russia; Saxo III. iv) to practise seiðr upon the princess Rindr, to beget a son who would avenge Baldr (Kormakr, Sigurðardrápa 3/4: seið Yggr til Rindar; BDr 11; cf. Vsp 32-3). Among the ruses to seduce her, in Saxo, Óðinn disguises himself as a medicine-woman, called Wecha (i.e. ON Vekka* < Vetka* < Vitka*, 'sorceress', fem. forms of vitki, 'wizard', not elsewhere recorded in ON). As Strömbäck argues, 26, it is not necessary to emend to vitku in Lks since Óðinn is performing seiðr as a wizard by pretending to be female. When Óðinn sets out in his disguise, Saxo calls him a viator indefessus, seeking the Ruthenian king for the fourth time: this may relate to 24/5: fórtu verþiðð yfir.

25/1-8 See Lks Introd II.

25/3 seggjom: the sense must here be 'people (such as ourselves)', cf. Skm 4/2, where Freyr calls Skirnir seggr enn ungi, and not literally '(human) men'.

26/2 Fjörgyns: nothing is told of Frigg's father, though his name is ancient (AR § 514). He may have been the partner of Fjörgyn, Þórr's mother (Vsp 53/10), who was Jörð, but that would have been in an older pantheon. It is not known as an Óðinn-name.

26/4 Véa ok Vilja: I suggest that this is another of Loki's travesties of an archaic religious ritual situation. Frigg has been in bed with her husband, Vili, 'Desire', together with the god Vei, 'Hallowed One', who brings conception (Rig Introd I D. Theme II). At the same time, in a distinct context, she remains Viðrir's—Óðinn's—wife.

28/4 réð: I think the past tense fits the past act better than ræð, 'I am/shall be responsible for...'. There is no other reason here why Baldr should not be present in Ægir's hall than that he is dead. See commentary to 41/6; Ruggerini 60-1.

29/4-6 See commentary to 21/4-6.

30/4-6 Asa — verit: again a travesty of ancient characteristics of a goddess of love and fecundity. Freyja is the blótgyðja of the gods, priestess of sacrifices (Yng ch. 4). As priestess she would have the sacral role of prostitute, just as the 'sacred servants' and 'courtesans' of Aphrodite welcomed the embraces of worshippers (Pindar, Encomia 3, pp. 188-9; Clement of Alexandria, Exhortation to the Greeks 33, notes that the sacral fornication at Aphrodite's festivals is paid for by the initiated who 'bring their tribute of a coin to the goddess, as lovers do to a mistress (ἐταίρα)'; cf. Post 146: [Clemens] kveðr Freyju portkonu verit hafa; SG); for Babylonian custom, and the coin thrown 'in the name of the goddess' see Herodotus I. 199). One of Freyja's names is Þröng, 'Close Company' (cf. hvíluþröng, 'bed-embrace'), and it is presumably her sacral duty to sleep with all the Æsir; certainly Þórr is called langvinnr Þröngvar, 'long-standing friend, lover, of Þröng' (Þórsdr 17), though his wife is Sif. Freyja, who chooses half of the slain with Óðinn (Grím 14), epitomizes the female disir who seek the death of men to bring them lovers: thus, she embraces the ancestors, álfar, when they die, as Rán, her marine counterpart, catches men in her net (see commentary to Hamð 15/4; UD (h), 103). Like Loki, Gilgamesh turns upon the goddess of fecundity, Ishtar, and reviles her in a catalogue of her sensual myths. She complains to her father: 'Gilgamesh has recounted my stinking deeds, / my stench and my foulness'. She makes no denial (Pritchard 83-4). On harlot goddesses see also Motz (f), 104-8.

32/4-6 On this scene see UD (h), 101-3 ('The incestuous Vanir').

síztik — stóðo: MS. 'sitztu — siþo'. I adopt the old-established emendations (see Bugge (a) ad loc.), because the meaning requires this. The main vb., whether siðo or stóðo, calls for a pl. subject (regin); the nom. sg. -tu of the MS. (síztu) cannot therefore be correct. Emendation to -tic would not be paleographically strained. Siðo, 'bewitched', 'practised seiðr upon', is an unlikely action for the gods to take to make Freyja sleep with her brother, as Loki's whole point is to expose her habitual incest. The idiom standa e-n, 'to surprise, ambush someone', is well attested (Gróug 9/2-3, Háv 154/2; SG).

32/6 frata: hap. leg.; the ablaut variant freta is more common.

34/2-3 þú vart — goðom: the exchange of hostages after the Æsir-Vanir war (see commentary to Vsp 21-4) is told only in Yng ch. 4. In the telling of this very old myth of the uniting of gods, hostage-exchange after war might be a 'modernization' for a Viking society of an older story of departure and return of a fertility deity (cf. Vafþ 39) as seasons dictate. The Vanir's homeland and Ægir's domain are here located to the west of Útgarðr, where Þórr has his 'eastern travels' (cf. 60).

34/4-6 Hymis — migo: Hymir is the giant who lives east of Élivágar—the icy primordial waves—at heaven's end, against whom Þórr contends in fishing and from whom he steals the vast cauldron for brewing the gods' ale (Hym). In other words, an established enemy of the gods. In Þórsdr Þórr must wade through a raging mountain torrent: it proves to be caused by a giant's daughter urinating. Þórr, exerting his greatest might, grows as tall as the sky and surmounts the torrent (in SnE 106 he also throws a large stone—fatally—at the giantess: at ósi skal á stemma, 'one must stem a river at its estuary'). Loki, in his extravaganza, sees the great ocean as Njörðr's mouth and all the rivers flowing into it like giant girls—Hymir's daughters—pissing into a urine trough (see UD (h), 103-4). The urine of a household would often be pissed into a communal trough for cleansing and tanning leather; this may be the practical image behind Loki's joke.

35/4 þá ek moggat: Freyr and Freyja are a Vanir sister-brother pair. Freyja, in one of her forms, was involved in the Æsir-Vanir war. It would seem awkward if her brother-husband were not born until after their father Njörðr came to Ásgarðr (SnE 31). Practical aspects of the 'myths' develop as dramatic circumstances require them, without regard to older tradition. So Njörðr and Skaði become the parents of Freyr in Skm (see Skm commentary to prose prologue lines 4-5), though Loki mocks Njörðr for begetting him on his own sister (Lks 36).

36/4 systor þinni: there is no ON tradition of a sister of Njörðr, other than Snorri's remark in Yng ch. 4, that 'when Njörðr was with the Vanir, he had his sister as wife, because that was lawful there. Their children were Freyr and Freyja'. Snorri no doubt bases this upon Lks 36.

37/1-6 Freyr is now praised as a chivalrous knight in almost Arthurian terms, bringing comfort to ladies and magnanimously freeing prisoners (cf. Am 97/5-8; Skm Introd 1 B, stanza 7). A remarkable adaptation of Lks 37/4-6 is found in Hálfs Saga ok Hálfsrekka 192, vísa 59 (cf. Skjald A II. 266, B II. 288) as an exhortation by Hálfr to his army not to ill-treat women (presumably on their campaigns):

Bad ecki hann j her	[Hálfr] bade that in the army
hoptum [read hoptu] græta	no woman captive be made to weep, ne mannz konu	nor to a man's wife
meín at uína	harm be done;

mey bad hann hueria	he bade every maid
mundi kaupa	be bought with a bride price
faugru gulli	in fair gold
at faudr radi.	by her father's decision.

I suggest that the Lks line ok leysir ór hoptom hvern has indicated a military situation to the poet of the Hálfs Saga stanza, and the neat change of ór hoptom hvern into hoptu (so too EddMin) fits the king's words well with the prose vows made in ch. 5 of the saga (178/30): alldri hertoku þeir konur ne baurn.

ballriða, 'brave rider', ball- from balp-* being a Verner's Law variant of bald- (Akv 21/4: baldriða; these are the only occurrences of the term; for etymology see AEW s.v. ballr). The suggestion (Söderberg (a), 81) that there might be in ballriða some verbal play on bal, 'vagina', or þallr, 'testicle', might be relevant if Loki were the speaker, but would be dramatically out of place for Týr. For the audience, of course, Týr's unawareness of his own pun could be part of the joke. On Freyr as a lover see Skm Introd 1. That he might be imagined, and perhaps dramatically portrayed, as a very handsome ladies' man, keener on women than on war, is suggested by the nickname his enemies give Sturla Sighvatsson, Dala-Freyr, 'Freyr of the Dales' (i.e. the district of Dalir). On his penitential visit to Rome, 1233, report had it that people wept to see so beautiful a man—svá fríðr maðr—so pitifully castigated (Sturl (a) 1. 364; cf. 326, 327, 353). Perhaps his beauty helped him to win the clever young heiress Solveig, whom his uncle Snorri had hoped to marry (299-300). That reluctance to fight went with the name Dala-Freyr is evident from his enemy's remark, when Sturla refuses to attack: Ok ætla ek, at Dala-Freyr sanni nú nafn sitt ok standi eigi nær, 'I think that Dala-Freyr may now justify his name and keep at a distance' (353).

38/3 tilt: hap. leg. OE adj. til, 'good', 'just', 'wholesome' is common (see BT for the range of usage). Bera tilt með would mean 'to bring about a fair, satisfactory situation between' two sides in a dispute. Týr takes his personality from his unquestioning heroism, when he places his hand in the wolf Fenrir's mouth as a pledge of the gods' good faith when they try to bind him for the safety of the world (SnE 32). His deed demonstrates the cost of oath-breaking, and the need, sometimes, to incur that cost. The scanty evidence of Týr links him with covenants and law. He loses his right hand, the hand that pledges faith. The marital embarrassment that Loki (probably) invents for him (40) concerns an illegitimate son and the legal compensation for it (a tale for which there is no other source). The legal element is seen also in the OE Rune Poem 48: Tīw [MS. Tir] . . . healdeð trýwa wēl / wið æþelīngas, 'Tīw keeps faith well with princes'.

39/2 Hróðrsvitnis i.e. 'Fame's Wolf', elsewhere in the form Hróðvitnir; vitnir ('one with acute wits, senses') is a heiti for wolf (LP s.v.).

39/4 Úlfgi i.e. úlfr elided with eigi (Noreen § 291. 10).

39/5 þngom dat. pl. of þngr adj., 'narrow', 'confining' (cf. OE enge, 'narrow'—enge ānpaðas, 'narrow single-tracks'—'oppressive') used substantivally in dat. pl. for 'cramping difficulties' (see LP s.v. pngr; cf. OE engu fem., 'tight place', Grein s.v.).

39/6 ragnarøkrs: the word-play on rpk and røkr may well have been an early Christian development, as the older philosophical term, rpk, became less clearly understood (cf. Hyndl 1/5); see LP s.v. røkr. 'Destined end' becomes 'day's end'.

40/4 Öln né penning: Loki names the smallest quantities, 'ell of cloth' and 'penny coin' (a silver coin weighing less than a gram; SG); penningr is an early West Gmc word, of as yet undetermined origin, perhaps borrowed from OE into ON at quite an early date, since it occurs in Bragi Boddason's Ragnr 12 in a kenning for 'round shield': Svǫlnis salpenningr, 'Óðinn's hall-penny'. Valhöll was roofed with shields, looking just like pennies.

41/2 árósi: the river mouth is in fact the jaws of the wolf, the river being the slaver that flows from his watering mouth, which is held open by a sword to stop him biting. The river is named Ván, 'Expectation', 'Hope' (SnE 37); is the name a reminder that the wolf's hope of freedom is indeed fulfilled (Vsp 43/3-4)?

41/6 bundinn: according to Vsp 34, SnE 68-9, Loki is bound after his refusal to weep for Baldr; he admits (28/4) that his ráð determined Baldr's death. Loki ought not, therefore, to be at large now. The poet improvises as he wishes.

42/1-3 Gulli — sverð: if it is the legend in Skm that Loki is travestying, his lies are blatant, since Gerðr refused the gold and the sword was a threat, not a gift. The legend that Freyr's sword fell into the hands of the giants could have no place in Skm (see Skm Introd III; commentary to Vsp 50/3-4).

42/4 Muspellz synir: see commentary to Vsp 48/2-3.

42/5 Myrkvið: see commentary to Akv 3/4, Vkv 1/2.

43/2 Ingunar-Freyr: hap. leg. in ON extant verse, but it is evident from references in the prologue to Óláfs Saga helga 3-4 (the 'Great Saga of St Óláfr', based on Snorri's version) that this form of Freyr's name must also have occurred in both Ytal and Hál, though the verses cited in Hkr do not contain it (DH). Byggvir extols Freyr for noble race (I suggest) because he appears at the head of poetically famous genealogies—those of Haraldr hárfagri and Jarl Hákon, for example.

Ingun-: a derivative of Gmc Ingw-* with nasal suffix as in Germ II, Ingaevones, i.e. Ingvaeones, and probably OE Ingwina (gen. pl., Beowulf 1044, 1319); cf. AR § 449. DH note that Ingunar- could be a woman's name, so 'Ingun's Freyr', comparing 'Qlrun's Egill' (Qlrunar-Egill; Vkv Introd IV. A). Might this relate to an archaic brother-sister pair, Ingvi* and Ingun*? Byggvir would then be innocently confirming the incest of the Vanir pair (32, 36) by citing this old title instead of using the doublet Yngvi-Freyr (Hál 13; Hkr I. 24-5). Snorri appears to have been concerned by the form Ingunar-, since he offers a doublet Ynguni for Yngvi (Hkr I. 34), not found elsewhere. If Ingunar- is not fem. the form is difficult to explain (see AEW s.v. Ingunarfreyr for further reference).

43/3 sællíkt setr: i.e. Álfheimr (Grim 5), realm of the immortal dead (Vkv Introd II. C).

43/4 mergi smæra: the image behind Byggvir's words—of the limbs of a body being ground to pulp, bone into marrow—reflects the archaic myth of the inauguration of the corn-mill by sacrifice (see commentary to 45/1).

43/5 mǫlða: hap. leg. from mǫlva*, a variant of mylja, 'to pound, smash, break into pieces' (see Feist s.v. ga-malwjan).

meinkráko: i.e. prophesying harm for Freyr.

44 The stanza is a riddle, difficult to translate until one knows the answer. What creature is being described? It is small, has a wagging tail, is sly in snapping up morsels of food, is continually 'at the ears' of Freyr (i.e. as his informer or confidant, eyrarúni?), and (while pecking up grains beside the corn-mill?) will keep up a chirruping gossip. I think it is a bird because I associate the vocabulary with birds: the wagtail, the eagle that snápir (Háv 62), the vb. klaka which is used primarily of bird-talk (cf. Ríg 35: Klök nam fugla) and secondarily of gossip. Óðinn has two ravens that inform him (Grim 20; SnE 42-3). Birds cleverly peck grains from the ears of corn. In Gautreks Saga 10 a sparrow is the corn-plunderer. So too in Hkr I. 35-6 (Yng ch. 18), and here the story throws light on Lks 44: Dagr, king of Denmark, understood birds' voices. He had a sparrow that flew into many lands and told him much news. Once the sparrow flew into a peasant's cornfield and fed there. The peasant threw a stone at the bird and killed it. Dagr sacrificed a boar to obtain news of the bird, and led an army to avenge it. As he was returning home after the slaughter, a labourer ran out of a wood and flung a pitchfork at the army: it struck Dagr and he was killed. A stanza here cited from Ytal records this legend succinctly. Details indicate that Dagr is a Freyr-figure: his name 'Day', his boar-sacrifice, his death by a two-pronged implement, reminiscent of horns and tusks (cf. AR § 464; I thank Alan Davey for the references to the corn-eating sparrows). The assiduity of a sparrow fits Byggvir well; I suggest that Loki (and the poet) have chosen the sparrow's image because the bird was already familiar in fables of the fertility god.

loggja: hap. leg. in ON, but in Danish logre, loggre, 'to wag the tail', 'to fawn, be flattering, sycophantic', is well recorded. An eagerly pecking bird seems to be bowing continually.

snápir: only here and Háv 62 (of an eagle hungrily scanning the sea for fish, opening and shutting its beak).

at eyrom Freys: what news would Freyr want? Perhaps of the progress of his corn—which a sparrow might test for him—or of his brewing, which his Barley Boy butler would know. Óðinn's ravens were no doubt principally war-reporters. •

45/1 Byggvir: from bygg, 'barley' (cf. OE Bēow in the Anglo-Saxon genealogies). In Lks he appears as a popular servant-figure, drawing his character from generations of corn- and brewing-games and ceremonies. He appears, however, to have had once a more serious cult significance, as a divine figure, ground up like corn in the mill to provide the livelihood of his people (see the most detailed recent analysis of the sources by Tolley (c); on 74 note the reference to a 10 c. pagan feast preserved in a Muslim land, at which 'The women weep for [Tammūz] because his master slew him by grinding his bones under a millstone and winnowing them in the wind'. It is notable that Tammūz is ground up under the millstone by his master. Byggvir too has a master; the mythologem may always have had this folk-tale element.

45/2 bráðan: Byggvir appears to regard bráðan as a compliment, but it brings with it implications of the rashness, impatience, and violence of drunkenness.

46/3 deila — mat: I know of no specific happening to which this might refer and take the reference to be to the maladroitness in general of a drunken Fimafengr.

46/4–6 ok þik — verar: here Byggvir is seen as the personification of all the ale spilt into the straw covering of the hall floor when men quarrel and fight at feasts. Such loss of ale is noted with particular vividness in Ragnr 4/5–6 ('the well of the ale-cups blended with blood'; cf. Hamð 23/2). The disappearance of the ale under the straw then becomes an image of Byggvir's cowardly self-concealment when fighting starts (see McKinnell (a), 250).

47/3 lezkaðu: i.e. letr (letja, 'to hinder') + sk (reflexive, with assimilation lezk) + a (negative) + ðu.

47/4 ofdrykkia: I do not know why the proverbial disapproval of drunkenness should be attributed to Heimdallr (cf. Háv 11). Could it be because he has the well of mead at his foot, and — heiðvanr (Vsp 27/3)—uses it with discretion morgin hverian (Vsp 28/12)?

48/4 aurgo baki: a derisory reference to the aurgr fors of Vsp 27 (see Vsp Introd II ad loc.) from the well at the tree's foot, which laves the tree (i.e. Heimdallr). See UD (h), 104–6; (i), 666–9 for further discussion and references. The MS. spelling 'ærgo' could also be interpreted as prgo, 'cowardly', 'effeminate' (from argr), implying homosexual habits (cf. the nið in Bjarn 154–5), but this would only be useful as a pun on aurgo/prgo (for which the vowel sounds might be too distinct).

49/4–6 þvíat — goð: in SnE 69 Loki is bound on three sharp-edged stones with his son's intestines, which turn into iron. In the H variant of Vsp 34/5–8 Váli binds Loki with hard chains of guts.

ins hrímkalda magar: 'frost-cold' implies 'of (frost-)giant race'. As Loki begot Hel, the wolf, and the world serpent upon a giantess (SnE 34), tradition has assumed other offspring of his had similar origins.

50/4–6 The giant Þjazi (father of Skaði) abducted Iðunn, who was rescued by Loki flying off with her, disguised as a falcon with her as a nut in his claws. Þjazi pursues, as an eagle. The Æsir stack kindling within their walls and, after Loki has alighted, they set fire to the kindling so that the pursuing eagle's feathers are burned and the Æsir get their hands on Þjazi—as Loki says—and kill him (SnE 80).

51/6 kpld ráð: see commentary to Vkv 31/6. Skaði's coldness to Loki reflects also the coldness of her supernatural character: she is the skiing goddess, þundurdís, the winter huntress (AR § 561).

52/1–6 There is no tradition elsewhere of Skaði inviting Loki to her bed, but he performs a strange sexual charade for her (to make her laugh again, after her father's death, as she has requested; SnE 81). He ties a cord to a she-goat's beard and the other end of the cord to his own testicles: both pull hard to get away, now one giving way, now the other, shrieking loud. Then Loki made himself fall on Skaði's lap, and she laughed, and agreed to a pact of peace with the gods. I know of no parallel for Loki's jest, but the ancient tradition that laughter-rousing obscenity can dispell the grief of mourning for the dead is seen also in the legend of Demeter, grieving for Persephone, who is only brought to laughter by the obscene erotic dance of an old woman (AR §§ 209, 502; Clunies Ross).

Laufeyjar son, 'Leaf-island's son' (also in Þrym 18, 20). Laufey was also called Nál, 'Pine needle' (SnE 34). She would be a fitting mother for Lóðurr, if he were a god of vegetation (see commentary to Vsp 18/7).

getit verðr oss slíks . . . : Loki adopts a prim self-righteous tone, caricaturing the notion of moral account-books.

53/1–3 Heill — miaðar: a deliberate borrowing from Skm 37.

53/4 hana: for the self-deprecating use of the third person by a goddess speaking of herself, cf. Hynrl 4/1–2.

54/6 hór ok af Hlórriða: lit. '[being] an adulterer, and to Hlórriði's detriment', af having the sense 'taking from' (so DH; rather than LP 'because of'). In Hárð 48 Óðinn tells Þórr that Sif á hó heima, 'has a lover at home', to make him go home more quickly. The poet of Lks may have borrowed the motif deliberately to herald Þórr's thunderous return. (Hór, acc. hó, would seem to be a colloquial variant of hórr; see Fritzner s.vv.). See also commentary to Vsp 44/6.

Hlórriða: an old name for Þórr (cf. Vell 15); the sense of the first element, Hlór-, is undetermined as yet.

56/1 Beyla: a nickname probably derived from baula, 'cow', rare in ON (cf. Modlcel baula, 'to low'; in Bisk 1. 593 kýr . . . drepnar, 'slaughtered cows', are equated with baulu-föll, 'cow carcasses'. Dumézil (d), 98–105, argues for Beyla as a diminutive of búu, 'bee', representing mead, beside Byggvir's beer. In this case we should read Býla, taking ey as an erroneous spelling for y, as in 'beygvir' (see the textual note to Lks prologue line 7).

56/3–4 meini blandin . . . ókynian: is Beyla so violently insulted not only because she is dirty (dritin), but because she makes her dairy-products dirty? (Compare the early English drinking song, 'Bryng vs in no butter, for therin are many herys . . .', in Greene 255. Butter churns have been excavated that still contain the long red hairs of the English dairymaids.)

ókynian is a strong word: would she be dressed up in horns?

56/6 deigia: originally, no doubt, 'kneader of dough', but developing more general significances (cf. OE hlāfdige, 'lady'); here used of a maidservant on a farm occupied with pasturing and milking the cows (M. Olsen 36; Ruggerini commentary ad loc.). Dumézil (d), 103, notes that the descriptive name 'One who kneads' fits well the bee who kneads wax for the hive.

dritin: cf. the English milkmaids 'court-patched with cow-droppings' as they milk their cows in the meadows (Hardy, Tess of the d'Urbervilles ch. 25). Dumézil (d), 103–4, notes ancient interpretations of the pollen on a worker bee's body as 'dirt'.

57/3 Miðllnir: of uncertain etymology (? 'lightning', cf. Russian molnija, or 'pulverizer', cf. mala, 'to grind', málva, 'to crush'; AEW s.v.). See E. O. G. Turville-Petre 81–5 for a fine account.

57/4 Herða klett: klett, 'cliff', 'crag', 'rock-face', that juts up from the herðar, 'shoulders' (see Meissner (b), 127 (§ 45 b)).

58/1–2 Loki ostentatiously tells the audience—aside—that 'this is Þórr'.

Iarðar burr: so Þrym 1/7; cf. Vsp 53/10.

58/3 þrasir: the vb. occurs only here (cf. derivatives Lifþrasir, Vafþ 45; qrþrasir, 'urgent desirer', used of a giant, Þórsdr 17); related to drasill, 'fierce-snorting horse', see commentary to Vsp 19/2; cf. ModIcel þrasa, 'to quarrel, wrangle'.

58/5 þú skalt við úlfinn vega: we can imagine a scenario in which Óðinn is dead—gulped down by the wolf—and Þórr is turning to engage the wolf, when Víðarr strides down upon the scene and pierces the wolf himself. The serpent then arrives, engaging Þórr's attention. But this cannot be the scenario originally of Vsp, where úlf in 53/4 must be an error for orm (see Vsp Introd iii. c. Problems I (ii), III (i) (c)). It can only be, therefore, a scenario dreamed up by the poet of Lks (or his source), conceivably suggested by ignorant oral versions that had úlf and not orm in the scene of Þórr's last fight. So outrageous are the travesties in the senna-tradition that an accusation that Þórr trembled to face the wolf might be regarded as normal.

59/4 verp: Þórr was a practised hurler: of his hammer (SnE 103), of red-hot iron (SnE 107), of a giant's eyes into heaven (Hárþ 19).

59/5 á austrvega: i.e. into the realm of the giants.

60/1–3 Austrförum þínom: Þórr's mention of 'eastern paths' leads Loki to Þórr's eastern humiliations, when he thought a giant's glove was a hall (60/4–5) and could not untie the giant's knots on his food-bag (62/4–7). These are incidents we know from Gylfaginning (SnE 50–1).

skaltu — frá: Loki in mock awe repeats Frigg's anxious phrases (25/2–3).

60/5 hnúkðir, 'sat crouching'; only here in ON, but in ModIcel not uncommon (see Blöndal s.v. hnúka fem., 'a crooked, crumpled figure'; hnúka vb., 'to sit in a bent position'; hnökkinn, 'bent'; AEW s.v. hnúka).

einheri: the einherjar are Óðinn's warrior champions who live with him in Valhöll, duelling every day, feasting in friendship (Vafþ 41, Grím 18, 23; SnE 42–4). Loki mocks Þórr as one of this picked band, huddled in a ludicrous hiding-place. Nowhere else is the sg. of einherjar used. M. Olsen, 40–3, suggests that einheri could be meant also as a pun on -heri, 'hare': to have the heart of a hare—hera hjarta—is to be a coward (Fritzner s.v. heri). The image of a frightened lone hare would fit well with hnúkðir.

61/5 Hrungnis bana: Þórr reminds Loki of his triumphant duel with the giant Hrungnir, when the great hammer splinters the giant's whetstone in mid-air and then the giant's skull (Haustr 18; SnE 102–5).

62/1–6 Prancing with the pertness of a schoolboy under the great hammer, Loki defies it to kill him and continues to harp on Þórr's discomfiture at the hands of the giant Skrímir. 'You may be able to smash a giant's skull, but you cannot undo his knots!'

skarpar, 'hard to get the better of' (Fritzner s.v. skarpr § 6).

svaltz: on the 2nd person sg. pret. ending see Noreen § 543. 2b.

63/6 fyr nágrindr neðan: cf. Skm 35/3.

64/6 ek veit at þú vegr: I suggest that this is a reference to Þórr's killing of the giant builder (Vsp 26/1–2) despite the oaths sworn by the gods. Loki has Óðinn's safe-conduct—lát úlfs fýður / sitia sumblí at (10)—but what is it worth when Þórr is þrunginn móði? (see UD (c), 85–6).

Prose This epilogue seems to be a severely abbreviated version of SnE 69–70. There is no reference to the place where Loki was bound, so the discrepancy between the threatened hiðrvi of Lks 49 and the eggsteinar of SnE is not noticed. Happily, Snorri's invention of Váli Lokason (see Vsp Introd iii. c. Problem III (iii) (a)) is not adopted. The writer is too cryptic when he does not explain the connection between Nari's entrails and Narfi's change into a wolf. The epilogue is nevertheless valuable to readers of the Codex, in that it explains allusions in the poem to Loki's fate.

On the discrepancy between the pursuit and binding of Loki after Baldr's death and after his cursing of the gods see commentary to 41/6; Söderberg (c), 83–94.

SKÍRNISMÁL

CONTENTS

TEXT AND TRANSLATION	376
INTRODUCTION	386
I. Skírnismál: The Play and its Plot	386
A. Programme notes and stage directions	386
B. Dramatic sequence of the stanzas	387
1. Freyr in love (1 – 9)	387
2. Skírnir's journey (10 – 25)	390
3. Skírnir's curse (26 – 36)	392
4. Gerðr's capitulation (37 – 39)	395
5. Skírnir's return (40 – 42)	395
C. Dramatic techniques	395
II. Analogues of the Plot	396
A. The mating of Sky and Earth	396
B. A curse on fields and its remedy	397
C. The love spell	398
D. Skírnir's mythological role	399
III. The Dating of Skírnismál	400
IV. The Texts of Skírnismál	403
COMMENTARY ON THE TEXT	404

SKÍRNISMÁL

Freyr, sonr Niarðar, hafði setzk í Hliðskiálfr ok sá um heima alla. Hann sá í lǫtunheima, ok sá þar mey fagra, þá er hón gekk frá skála fǫður síns til skemmo. Þar af fekk hann hugsóttir miklar.

Skírnir hét skósveinn Freys. Niðrðr bað hann kveðia Frey mál. Þá mælti Skaði:

Freyr, the son of Niðrðr, had seated himself on Hliðskiálfr, and was gazing into all the world's realms. He looked into Giant Realms and saw there a lovely girl, just as she was walking from her father's hall to her bower. From that sight he caught great sickness of heart.

Skírnir was the name of Freyr's servant. Niðrðr asked him to get Freyr to talk. Then Skaði said:

- | | |
|---|--|
| 1 Rístu nú, Skírnir, ok gakk at beiða okkarn mála mög
ok þess at fregna:
hveim enn fróði sé
ofreiði afi? | Now Skírnir, get up and go and request some speech from our boy
and ask him this:
against whom in that fertile brain
might father's heir be fuming? |
|---|--|

Skírnir kvað:

- 2 Illra orða
er mér [v]ón at ykrom syni,

Skírnir said:

- Harsh words
I can hope for from your son

Skírnismál] so A; Fǫr Skírnir R. I have followed the current custom of using the A title. Prose line 1 hafði] hafði æinn dag A Indication of speakers: (a) in R Skaði (stanza 1) and Freyr (stanza 40) are signalled as speakers in the preceding prose. Within the stanza sequence itself Skírnir is signalled as speaker before stanza 2 (Scírnir q.) and before stanza 10 (Sc. mælti við hestinn), the Ambátt is signalled before stanza 15 (Ambót q.). Otherwise, the speakers have been noted in the outer margins of the MS. pages by their initial letter(s) followed by q. (kvað). The margins have been considerably cut away, so that few of these indications remain. Five initials survive for stanzas 3–8 (sc f. s. f. s.). Seven traces of q (and three dots) survive for stanzas 12–23. (b) in A Skaði is signalled as in R. Ten indications of speaker are within the stanza sequence itself (stanzas 2, 3 Scírnir q., stanzas 4, 6, 9 F. q., stanzas 5, 8 S. q., stanza 10 Scírnir m^{el}l'i við hæstiñ, stanza 14 Gærðr. q., stanza 15 Ambat q.). Ten indications are in the margin (stanza 12 .h^{ir}. q., stanzas 13, 19, 21, 23, 25 S. q., stanzas 16, 17, 20 (G. obliterated), 24 G. q.). In the printed text the speakers are stated without palaeographic notation.

Capitals (a) in R: in the prose passages capitals mark the beginnings of sentences as printed here, except that the following do not have capitals: Þar (prologue, line 3), Niðrðr, Þá (prologue, line 4), Freyr (prose before 40). When speakers' names are given in the continuous text, they have an initial capital. (b) in A: in prose prologue line 4 Skírnir and Niðrðr have capitals; in prose after 10, only initial Skírnir has a capital. Stanzas begin with a capital, except 4, 12, 13, 14. Marginal capitals are used in 11 and 17.

1/1 Rístu] Ris þu A 1/6 ofrē 'i þi R 2/2 vón] so A; ón R at ykrom] af ýðrum A ef ek geng at mæla við mög,

ok þess at fregna:
“hveim enn fróði sé
ofreiði afi?”

Skírnir kvað:

- 3 Segðu þat, Freyr,
fólkvaldi goða
—ok ek vilia vita—
hví þú einn sitr en[d]langa sali
—minn dróttinn—um daga.

Freyr kvað:

- 4 Hví um segiak þér,
seggr enn ungi,
mikinn móðtrega?—
þvíat álfrǫðull lýsir um alla daga
ok þeygi at mínom munom.

Skírnir kvað:

- 5 Muni þína
hykka ek svá mikla vera,
at þú mér, seggr, né segir, þvíat ungir saman
várom í árdaga—
vel mættim tveir trúask.

Freyr kvað:

- 6 Í Gymis gǫrðom
ek sá ganga
mér tíða mey:
armar lýsto en af þaðan
alt lopt ok lǫgr.

- 7 Mær er mér tíðari
en mann[i] hveim

if I go to speak to the boy
and ask him this:
“against whom in that fertile brain
might father's heir be fuming?”

Skírnir said:

Tell me, Freyr, field-marshal of gods
—for I would like to learn—why you sit alone in the long stretching halls
—my liegelord—day after day.

Freyr said:

Why should I say to you,
young sir,
the great sorrow of my soul?—
for the elf's orb shines through all the days and yet not to my needs.

Skírnir said:

Your needs
I think are not so great that you cannot say them to me, sir, for we were young together in the old days—
we two might well trust each other.

Freyr said:

In Gymir's courts
I saw walking a girl to my liking:
her arms shone
and from them, from there—all the air and water.

The girl is more to my liking than to that of any man

2/5–6 hveim — afi] so A; abbreviated h. ē. f. s. o. a. R
3/5 endlanga] so A; enlanga R (not en langa as FJ Facs 21/18, JH)
5/6 tveir] om. A 6/2 ek sá] sa æk A; see commentary.
6/6 lǫgr] lægr A 7/2 manni] so A; man R
3/1 Segðu] Sæg þv m^{er} A
5/2 svá mikla] mikla sva A 6/5 þaðan] þæim A ungom í árdaga.

Ása ok álfa
þat vill engi maðr
at vit sát[t] sém.

young in the old days.
Of Æsir and elves
there is not any who wants us two to be at one.

Skírnir kvað:

8 Mar gefðu mér þá,
þann er mik um myrkvan beri
vísan vafroga,
ok þat sverð
er siálfvægiz við iðtna ætt.

Skírnir said:
The horse give me then that can get me over the dark divining, darting flame,
and the sword
that can fight of itself against the giants' race.

Freyr kvað:

9 Mar ek þér þann gef er þik um myrkvan berr
vísan vafroga,
ok þat sverð
er siálfvægiz mun vegaz —ef sá er horskr er hefir!

Freyr said:
The horse I give you that will get you over the dark divining, darting flame,
and the sword
that will fight of itself
—if he has a brave wit who bears it!

Skírnir mælti við hestinn:

10 Myrkt er úti—
mál kveð ek okr fara
úrig fiðr yfir, þursa þjóð yfir—
báðir vit komumk
—eða okr báða tekr!—
sá inn ámátki iðtunn!

Skírnir talked with the horse:
It is dark outside—time, I say, for us to travel over mist-dank mountains, over ogre-folk's land—
together we shall gain our goal —or together he'll get us,— that grisly great giant!

Skírnir reið í Iðtunheima til Gymis garða. Þar vóro hundar ólmir, ok bundnir fyrir skiðgarðs hliði, þess er um sal Gerðar var. Hann reið at þar er fēhirðir sat á haugi ok
kvaddi hann:

Skírnir rode into Giant Realms to Gymir's courts. There were raging dogs there, tied in front of the gate in the wooden enclosure round Gerðr's hall. He rode to where a shepherd was sitting on a grave-mound and greeted him:

7/3 ungom] so A; ungom R 7/6 sát[t] sát R (with omission of the dot above t signifying tt; see JH1 xiii § 6); sāt A (cf. 23/6). See commentary. 8/1 gefðu] gæf þu A 8/1-2 þa, / þann] þap^{an} A 8/2 er] om. A um myrkvan] of mýrkā A 9/2 um myrkvan] of mýrkā A 10/4 þursa] so A; þyria R 10/5 komumk] komūz A 10/7 sá] om. A Prose line 4 skiðgarðs] so A; skiðgarði. R (at the end of the MS. page)

11 Segðu þat, hirðir
—er þú á haugi sitr
ok varðar alla vega—
hvé ek at an[d]spilli komumk ens unga mans
fyr greyiom Gymis?

Say, you shepherd
—as you sit on the grave-mound and watch all the ways—how shall I have words with the young wench past Gymir's dogs?

[Hirðir] kvað:

12 Hvárt ertu feigr
eða ertu framgenginn
An[d]spillisvanr þú skalt æ vera góðrar meyar Gymis.

The shepherd said:
Is death's doom upon you or are you departed already No hope of words will you ever have with the good daughter of Gymir.

Skírnir kvað:

13 Kostir ro betri
heldr en at klökkva sé, hveim er fúss er fara:
eino dægri
mér var aldr um skapaðr
ok alt líf um lagit.

Skírnir said:
There are better options than acting the coward for any man keen to be going:
to only one day or night
my life's end was dated,
and all my existence ordained.

Gerðr kvað:

14 Hvat er þat hlymia, er ek heyri nú til
ossom rōnnom í?
Iðrð bifaz, en allir fyrir
skiálfa garðar Gymis!

Gerðr said:
What noise is that I am hearing now within our houses?
The earth is trembling and with it all the courts of Gymir are quaking!

Ambátt kvað:

15 Maðr er hér úti
stigginn af mars baki:
ið lætr til iarðar taka.

The servant girl said:
There is a man here outside,
dismounted from horseback:
he is putting his palfrey to graze.

11/1 Segðu] Sæg þv A 11/4 and-] so A, an- R 11/5 komumk] kōumz A 12/3 no lacuna indicated in either MS. 12/4 and-] so A, an- R 13/1 Kostir] marginal capital R 13/2 heldr] om. A at] om. A 13/5 um] om. A 14/1 hlymia] hlym hlymia R; hlym|hlymia A 14/2 heyri] so A; hlymia heyri R nú] om. A 14/5 rōnnom] hōllū A 15/3 lætr] lætr h^{ann} A

Gerðr kvað:

- 16 Inn bið þú hann ganga
í okkarn sal
ok drekka inn mæra mið
—þó ek hitt óumk
at hér úti sé minn bróðurbani.

Gerðr said:

- Invite him to enter into our chamber and drink the famous mead —although I dread that here outside may be my brother's killer.

- 17 Hvat er þat álfa
né ása sona
né vís[s]a vana?
Hví þú einn um komt
eikinn fúr yfir
ór salkynni at siá?

- What elves' son is that or Æsir's son or wise Vanir's?
Why have you come alone across the fierce fire
to see our household?

Skírnir kvað:

- 18 Emkat ek álfa
né ása sona
né víssa vana—
þó ek einn um komk
eikinn fúr yfir
yðor salkynni at siá:

Skírnir said:

- I am not elves' son
nor Æsir's son nor wise Vanir's—
though I have come alone
across the fierce fire
to see your household:

- 19 Epli elli lyfs
hér hefi ek algullin—
þau mun ek þér, Gerðr, gefa, frið at kaupa—
at þú þér Frey kveðir óleiðastan at lifa.

- Apples for age-healing
I have here, all of gold—these I shall give you, Gerðr, to purchase peace—
that you may say for your part Freyr is not the most loathsome man living.

Gerðr kvað:

- 20 Epli elli lyfs
ek þigg aldregi
at mannzkis munom,
né vit Frey[r],

Gerðr said:

- Apples for age-healing
I shall never accept for any man's pleasure,
nor shall Freyr and I,

16/4 óumk] oumz A 17/1–2 álfa né ása] asa æ^{da} alfa A 17/3 víssa] so A; vísa R
17/4 um] om. A 17/5 eikinn fúr yfir] æik inn fyr^{ir} A. JH notes that the spelling of R eikinn here and 18/5 with single -n reflects a scribal equivalence of n and s found elsewhere in R (a) as the final letter in an unstressed syllable (as here), and (b) in other positions, e.g. 18/3 vana (JH xiv § 11, xiii § 6) 17/6 ór] var A 18 not in A 18/3 vana] vana R. See note to 17/5. 19/1 ellilyfs] ellifo R; xi.
A. See commentary. 19/3 mun] man A 19/6 at] om. A 20/1 ellilyfs] .xi. R, A 20/3 mannzkis] m^{annz} ænkis A 20/4 Freyr] so A; Frey (taken as acc. after vit spelt við) R meðan okkart fiqr lifir, byggjom bæði saman.

as long as our two lives last,
both live together.

Skírnir kvað:

- 21 Baug ek þér þá gef, þann er brendr var
með ungum Óðins syni.
Átta ero iafnhofgir, er af driúpa
ena níundo hveria nótt.

Skírnir said:

- I give you the ring, then,
that was burnt
with Óðinn's young son.
There are eight, just as heavy,
that from off it drop every ninth night.

Gerðr kvað:

- 22 Baug ek þikkak—
þótt brendr sé
með ungum Óðins syni.
Era mér gullz vant
í gorrðom Gymis,
at deila fé fōður.

Gerðr said:

- The ring I will not accept—even though it was burnt
with Óðinn's young son.
I've no lack of gold
in Gymir's courts,
dispensing my father's fortune.

Skírnir kvað:

- 23 Sér þú þenna mæki, mæ
—mióvan, málfán—
er ek hefi í hendi hér?
Höfuð höggva
ek mun þér halsi af,
nema þú mér sætt segir!

Skírnir said:

- Do you see, girl, this sword
—slim, sign-marked—
that I have in my hand here?
I shall hack your head
from off your neck,
if you do not declare accord with me!

Gerðr kvað:

- 24 Ánauð þola
ek vil aldregi
at mannzkis munom—
þó ek hins get,
ef it Gymir finnis,
vígs ótrauðir,
at ykr vega tíði.

Gerðr said:

- Suffer coercion
I never shall for any man's pleasure—
yet this I guess,
if you and Gymir meet,
keen for battle,
a killing will be the end for you both!

Skírnir kvað:

- 25 Sér þú þenna mæki, mæ
—mióvan, málfán—

Skírnir said:

- Do you see, girl, this sword
—slim, sign-marked—

20/5 okkart] okkat A 20/6 byggjom bæði] byggv bæð (i.e. 'share a bed') A 21/4–6 not in A 21/6 hveria] hverio R 22/1–3 not in A 23/5 ek mun] mun æk A (cf. 6/2) 23/6 sætt] sat (i.e. sattu or satt) A (cf. 7/6) 24/3 mannzkis] manz ænskis A 24/5 it] þit
A 25/1–3 Sér — hér] abbreviated Ser þ. þ. m. m^{er}. e^r. e. h. h. h^{er} R; Ser þv þ^{ann}na meki. m. m.
e. i. h^{er} A

- er ek hefi í hendi hér?
Fyr þessom eggjom
hnígr sá inn aldni iqtunn—verðr þinn feigr faðir.
- 26 Tamsvendi ek þik drep,
en ek þik temia mun,
mær, at mínom munom.
Þar skaltu ganga er þik gumna synir
síðan æva sé.
- 27 Ara þúfo á
skaltu ár sitia,
horfa heim[i] ór,
snugga heliar til.
Matr sé þér [meirr] leiðr en manna hveim
enn fráni ormr með firom.
- 28 At undrsíonóm þú verðir,
er þú út kœmr:
á þik Hrímnir hari!
á þik hotvetna stari!
Víðkunnari þú verðir en vörðr með goðom!
Gapi þú grindom frá!
- 29 Tópi ok ópi,
tiqsull ok óboli—
vaxi þér tár með trega!
Seztu niðr,
en ek mun segja þér sváran sútbreka
ok tvennan trega.
- 30 Tramar gneypa
þik skolo gerstan dag
- that I have in my hand here?
By the edges of this blade
the old giant will sink—
your father will find his fate.
- With taming stick I touch you,
for I will make you tame,
girl, to my wishes.
There you shall go where sons of men never see you again.
- On the eagle's hillock from early dawn you shall sit,
gaze out of the world,
hanker for hell.
May food be more repellent to you than the shiny snake to every man among the living.
- A monstrous sight may you be when you move out of doors:
let Hrímnir speechless stare at you!
let every creature glare at you!
Wider fame may you get than the watchman with the gods!
Gape from the bars of the gates!
- Idiocy and howling, plaguing pang and unbearable need—may your tears grow with grief!
Sit down,
and I shall describe to you a heavy sea of sorrow and a double grief.
- Evil sprites will bow your neck through the bitter day

26/6 sé] sia A 27/1-2 Ara — sitia] Ár skalltu sitia ara þúfo á A 27/3 heimi ór] hei
(i.e. heim or heimi) followed by omission sign, ór supplied in the margin in R. In A heimi is omitted; 7 is supplied (instead of ór) to form a sequence horfa ok snugga heliar til from 27/3-4 27/5 meirr] so
A; om. R 27/7 firom] The text of A ends here. 29/1 Tópi] marginal capital R 29/6 sútbreka] súsbreka R. See commentary.

- iqtina gorrðom í.
Til hrímpursa hallar
þú skalt hverian dag kranga kostalaus,
kranga kostavon.
Grát at gamni
skaltu í gogn hafa
ok leiða með tárom trega.
- 31 Með þursi þríhǫfuðom
þú skalt æ nara,
eð[a] verlaus vera!
Þik geð grípi,
þik morn morni!
Ver þú sem þistil[l], sá er var þrunginn
í qnn ofanverða!
- 32 Til holtz ek gekk
ok til hrás viðar, gambantein at geta—
gambantein ek gat.
- 33 Reiðr er þér Óðinn, reiðr er þér Ásabragr, þik skal Freyr fíask
—en fyririlla mær!—
en þú fengit hefir gambanreiði goða!
- 34 Heyri iqtnar,
heyri hrímpursar,
synir Suttunga,
siálfir áslíðar—
hvé ek fyrirbýð, hvé ek fyrirbanna
manna glaum mani,
manna nyt mani!
- 35 Hrímgrímnir heitir þurs, er þik hafa skal
- in the giants' courts.
To the hall of the frost ogres you shall every day crawl, without choice, crawl, without resource.
In place of pleasure
you shall have weeping and take grief along with your tears.
- With a three-headed ogre you must for ever eke out your life or have no husband!
May passion seize you,
pining consume you!
Be like the thistle that was crushed
at the end of the reaping!
- To a forest I went and to a fresh-growing tree, a twig of power to get:
a twig of power I got.
- Enraged with you is Óðinn, enraged with you is Æsir's Prince, Freyr shall turn his hate on you —most vicious girl!—
for you have gained
the gods' powerful wrath!
- Let the giants hear,
let the frost ogres hear,
the sons of the Suttungar, the Æsir hosts themselves—
how I forbid,
how I deny
the joyous sound of men to this maid,
the joyous fruit of men to this maid!
- Hrímgrímnir the ogre is called who will have you

31/4 þik] þit R 34/5-6 fyrir- ... fyrir-] fyrir-¹ abbreviated fyrir-² fyrir-³. See textual note to Lokasenna 57/3.

fyr nágrindr neðan:
þar þér vílmegir á viðar rótom
geita hland gefi.
Æðri drykkio
fá þú aldregi,
mær—at þínom munom,
mær—at mínom munom!

down below the corpse pens:
let serfs there at the tree's roots
serve you goats' urine.
Grander drink
you will never get,
girl—to meet your wishes,
girl—to meet my wishes!

36 Þurs ríst ek þér ok þriá stafi,
ergi ok æði
ok óþola
—svá ek þat af ríst,
sem ek þat á reist,
ef gøraz þarfar þess.

'Ogre' I carve for you and three characters:
'Lust' and 'Burning'
and 'Unbearable Need'
—I shall carve it off
just as I have carved it on,
if reasons for that arise.

Gerðr kvað:

37 Heill ver þú nú heldr, sveinn, ok tak við hrímkálli
fullom forns miaðar
—þó hafða ek þat ætlat, at myndak aldregi
unna vaningia vel.

Gerðr said:
Rather be welcome now, boy,
and receive the crystal cup
full of ancient mead
—yet I had intended that I would never in this life like one of the Vaningiar well.

Skírnir kvað:

38 Ørindi mín
vil ek þll vita,
áðr ek riða heim heðan:
nær þú á þingi
munt enom þroska
nenna Niarðar syni.

Skírnir said:
My message
complete I mean to know, before I ride home from here:
when at a tryst
you intend to favour Niðrðr's thriving son.

Gerðr kvað:

39 Barri heitir,
er vit bæði vitom,
lundr lognfara.
En ept nætr nío
þar mun Niarða[r] syni
Gerðr unna gamans.

Gerðr said:
Barri it is called,
which we two both know,
a grove becalmed.
And after nine nights
to Niðrðr's son there
Gerðr will grant his pleasure.

35/9 at] af R 36/1 Þurs] no initial capital R 36/6 r'e'ist R 39/4 En] en | en
R nio] ix. R

Þá reið Skírnir heim. Freyr stóð úti ok kvaddi hann ok spurði tíðinda:

Skírnir then rode home. Freyr was standing out of doors and greeted him and asked for news:

40 Segðu mér þat, Skírnir—áðr þú verpir sððli af mar ok þú stígir feti framarr—hvat þú árnaðir
í iðtunheima
þíns eða míns munar.

Tell me, Skírnir—before you toss saddle from steed and step one stride further—what you achieved in Giant Realms
for your content and mine?

Skírnir kvað:

41 "Barri heitir,
er vit bæði vitom,
lundr lognfara.
En ept nætr nío
þar mun Niarðar syni
Gerðr unna gamans."

Skírnir said:

"Barri it is called,
which we two both know,
a grove becalmed.
And after nine nights
to Niðrðr's son there Gerðr will grant his pleasure."

Freyr kvað:

42 Løng er nótt—
langar ro tvær—
hvé um þreiyak þriár?
Opt mér mánaðr
minni þótti
en síá hálf hýnótt.

Freyr said:

Long is a night—long are two—how can I suffer through three?
Often a month to me seemed shorter than half of this nuptial night.

41/1–6 abbreviated rather erratically: Bari. h. l. (i.e. lundr) e' vi. l. l. e. e. n. n. þ. m. n. s. g. v. gamās.
R 42 cited in SnE 41 with two variant lines: Løng er nótt, / løng er önnur, / hvé mega ek (megak
T) þreiyak þriár? / Opt mér mánaðr / minni þótti, / en síá hálf hýnótt. See commentary to 42/3.

INTRODUCTION

1. Skírnismál: The Play and its Plot

A. Programme notes and stage directions

The prose prologue outlines an initial situation for the story which is not needed for the plot. We do not need to be told that Freyr sat on Hliðskjálf and saw into Giant Realms: he tells us himself that he saw into 'Gymir's courts' (6/1-3). The sun's god can see everywhere, crossing the heaven every day and nightly passing through the underworld. He has no need of Óðinn's shamanic seat. The poet has already provided an excellent poetic opening for the action: doting parents, anxious about their son's eccentric behaviour, dispatch a trusted servant to discover the reason for it. Why did an inventive mind supply a prologue in which Freyr seats himself on Hliðskjálf and sees Gerðr in Giant Realms? Almost certainly, I suggest, because Skírnismál might often be performed with dramatic action. Two parents directing a servant are not as exciting as an opening dumb show which starts the audience guessing: Freyr enters the scene, creeps furtively up to Óðinn's seat, and mimes the sudden shock of love as his eyes light upon Gerðr. No doubt she will be represented too, a glorious blonde, perhaps, bearing a candle (note how elaborate Snorri makes this scene, as she lifts her hands to open the door of her splendid house and her luminous hands light up the world, SnE 40). Freyr will then stumble in despair to his own savourless hall, and the verse dialogue (1-3) will follow easily from the sight of his wretched figure in the background.¹ Snorri has also added a moral note, that the pain of Freyr's love was retribution for his presumption—mikillæti—in sitting upon Óðinn's 'holy' seat, but this notion does not enter the poem. The opening mime, with or without the mythological novelty of Freyr usurping Hliðskjálf, could have been a device as old as, or older than, the Skírnismál we know, but the poet, if he knew it, has declined to make any verbal use of it.

The two prose passages which mark the scene-changes after 10 and 39 are drawn from the poem itself to form 'stage directions'. They do not take the place of any stanzas now lost.

¹ On the dumb show in later drama see Mehl. See Gunnell (a) and (b) for valuable discussion of Norse pre-Christian drama; on the relation of the prose to the verse in Skm, see (b), 229-32. My work on Volume II was completed before I could obtain Gunnell's book.

B. Dramatic sequence of the stanzas

The first nine stanzas of the poem present the subtlest dialogue sequence in Norse comedy. The humour of Lokasenna and Hárbarðsljóð, satiric or burlesque, is abrupt, antagonistic, depending upon the swift scoring of rival points, not on an evolving discourse. The humour of Skírnismál is one of persuasion, where the brain of the persuader must be continually studying his 'adversary' in order to gain his point.

1. Freyr in love (1-9)

Freyr's doting parents, when they send Skírnir to interrogate Freyr, Stanza 1 speak of their son in heightened language, using terms in an archaic sense that relates to his sacred nature—fróði, afi—as fructifier and progenitor. It is as if they were deliberately maintaining the dignity of their sulking boy in front of his servant.

Skírnir's words are not, I think, meant to be heard by the parents. He is Stanza 2 already turning away from them, muttering to himself, sarcastically echoing their stilted terms. He is careful not to ask their son and heir 'who has put him in such a foul temper'. He chooses quite a different approach: soft Stanza 3 as silk, tentative—'I should like to know'—and flattering. Freyr is not a 'boy' to him, but a divine commander in the field, a sovereign lord who has all his loving allegiance—minn dróttinn. His enquiry must seem inspired by gentle sympathy—with a touch of reproach that Freyr should avoid those who love him, by sitting alone in those interminable solar mansions.

This tender approach makes Freyr feel very sorry for himself indeed. His Stanza 4 reply is ponderous with self-pity—mikinn móðtrega—and he makes the pretence of not wishing to tell Skírnir at all. What use could that be? He is just a little page, with no adult experience (the martial reminder—fólksvaldi goða—has, perhaps, put Freyr on his dignity). The sorrow that has come upon him has killed even his joy in the sun—which is the sole cause of his being. For another sun has taken its place. Freyr hints at this by linking the ineffectual sun—the álfrøðull—with the unfulfilment of his needs, his desires—minom munom.

Skírnir evidently catches this hint, for he responds at once with the same Stanza 5 phrase—Muni þína . . ., 'Your needs . . .' (whatever that may imply) can surely be told to so old a friend as himself: were they not young men together when the world was young?

Freyr's heart now opens, and he speaks with great simplicity: he saw in Stanza 6 the home of the sea-giant a girl—he envisages the scene once more—and her arms gleamed so, that all the water and air were lit by them. She must have seemed like a new sun to him, moving in her oceanic world. We may note that her arms do not illuminate land, but only sky and water, the visible oceanic elements.

Stanza 7 Freyr tries to express the depth of his feeling for this girl: it is a greater love than any young man ever felt in those old days, when the world was young. We see Freyr hovered over by doting parents, his every whim served ruthlessly by an assiduous servant: he is spoilt, cocooned, a baby. He is indeed the only Norse deity whose infancy is given human touches: he had a present when he got his first tooth:

Álfheim Frey gáfo	They gave Elf Realm to Freyr
í árdaga	in the old days,
tívar at tannfé.	the gods, as a tooth-gift.

(Grímnismál 5)

This is in the tradition of the joyous childhood of the little sun-god of the ancient Greek world, who laughs when he is born.²

When Freyr was a child, was he given, to be his servant, a boy born on the same 'day or night' as himself, as Jarl Hákon was given Karkr (Heimskringla 1. 297: 'Vit várum fæddir á einni nótt,' segir jarl. 'Skammt mun ok verða milli dauða okkars', "We two were born on one night," says the jarl, "and there will be little space between our deaths")? Freyr and Skírnir also are fatally linked (see stanza 10). When Freyr and Skírnir were young men together 'in the old days', did Skírnir 'go a-wooing' with Freyr, assisting him in amorous escapades that earned him the reputation of kindness to all women?³

mey hann né grætir	he makes no maiden weep
né mannz kono . . .	nor man's wife . . .

(Lokasenna 37/4-5)

Is Skírnir alluding to this when he reminds Freyr of 'the old days'? He would be helpful again if he knew what was needed. He could well have guessed from past experience that it was not any 'man' (cf. hveim, 1/5) who had brought this gloom upon Freyr, but yet another girl. If Skírnir's words, ungir saman / várom í árdaga, have reminded Freyr of his earlier loves, is he now looking back at himself ungom í árdaga and recognizing that his present love is greater than any youthful fancy ever was? For now, in this poem, Freyr is in his prime, þroskr (38/5). There is no mention of those childish 'old days' again.

Under the melancholy of his amor de lonh Freyr complains of the indifference of the world around him: not one of his own people, god or elf, is willing to make the slightest attempt to win this girl for him. As far as we know he has not asked anyone to do so (indeed, at the beginning of the poem it seems to have been a closely guarded secret). I take his words (7/4-6) to be another petulant hint (cf. 4/4-6) to Skírnir to take an interest in his problem.

² See Norden 59-72.

³ It may well be that there were no tales of Freyr's amorous adventures, and that his reputation as woman's friend arose simply because he was patron of marriages. The nickname Dala-Freyr for Sturla Sighvatsson perhaps suggests otherwise; see commentary to Lks 37/1-6.

Any approach to a girl with a father as formidable as Gymir would no doubt require diplomacy, but there is also a more particular reason—directly hinted at later in the poem—why Freyr may fear that the wooing will be difficult. In the old days, in a famous duel, he killed a giant (see commentary to Völuspá 51/5). Was this Gerðr's brother? Freyr uses the term sátt, 'reconciliation' (7/6), as the aim of his desire. This could be no more than a metaphorical term for the cessation of 'hostilities' in the 'war of love'. A woman's giving of her love is frið, 'peace' (19/4). But when Gerðr fears that 'her brother's slayer' has come (16/4-6), as Skírnir dismounts before her hall, and later declares (37/4-6), after she has been forced to yield, that she never thought she would ever feel kindly towards one of the Vanir, it becomes clear that in the text of this poem her hostility to Freyr has been realistically rooted in family feud. From an old piece of Freyr's mythology there comes the archaic dramatis persona of the bride-seeking bróðurbani to motivate Gerðr's angry dislike of the god and instantaneous refusal of his love.

The assumption of some scholars that in 7/4-6 Freyr implies that the gods and elves will stand in the way of any alliance with a giant's daughter, because the giants are their immutable enemies,⁴ is not supported by the rest of the poem: not only does the vital objection come from Gerðr herself, but Skírnir calls upon both gods and giants to join in cursing Gerðr if she refuses Freyr (33, 34).

While stanza 7 can be made to seem complex with implications, dramatically its message is simple: Freyr has found his greatest love, feels tragically that he may never win her, and pins all his hopes on Skírnir.

Stanza 8 Skírnir's response is immediate and unquestioning—he is, after all, Freyr's other self: he asks only for the necessary tools—the solar horse and the solar sword—with which he may penetrate and master the giants' underworld.

Stanza 9 Freyr presents these divine tools with military precision, and, like the fólkvaldi goða that he is, reminds his emissary to use his brains, and not only the bravado that possession of the giant-slaying sword may give him. This advice Skírnir is indeed obliged to follow.

⁴ For example, Lönnroth (a), S. A. Mitchell.

2. Skírnir's journey (10 – 25)

Stanza 10 Alone with the horse, out of doors in the dark, Skírnir is practical, prompt, and fatalistic. Embarking on the chill way ahead—úrig fiöll yfir—at the due hour of nightfall, when the sun must go into the dark, he talks to the horse with cold comfort: 'We are in this together. If the giant gets us, he'll get us both'. And the sun will not rise again on its diurnal course. Gymir, the ocean of death, will have overwhelmed them. So much is at stake, and Skírnir knows it (on this mythologem see Skírnismál Introduction III).

Prose A prose interlude now relates that Skírnir rode into Giant Realms to Gymir's courts, where the gate was guarded by savage dogs tied to it. He rode then to greet a shepherd sitting on a grave-mound (presumably near the gate). These facts are drawn from stanzas 10 – 12. What is not described, in prose or verse, is the vast jump of the solar horse over the vafrogi (cf. 8, 9) and, presumably, over the savage dogs as well. Instead of a descriptive enactment of the jump, like that of Hermóðr, SnE 64–5, the poet has given us the preliminary to it, the apprehensions of Skírnir and the horse, and the consequence of it, the shuddering of Gymir's courts and the consternation of Gerðr, when the horse lands with thunderous hooves on the grassy tún outside her door (cf. 14, 15). These 'stage directions'—for Skírnir's riding, the yelping dogs, the flickering flame—would invite audience support with hoof-claps and barks and torches.

Stanza 11 In stanza 10 we were shown Skírnir's anticipation of the deadly journey and the huge giant's hand waiting for them. In stanza 11 Skírnir has evidently arrived without trouble þursa þjóð yfir, but now encounters an unexpected set-back, the raging guard-dogs of Gymir. They are not, however, in this drama, intended to act as a set-back (since the horse evidently can take them in its stride), but rather to motivate the conversation with the shepherd on the grave-mound, and, together with the grave-mound, contribute to the scenery of the entrance to the world of the dead with its perpetual tribe of Cerberus. Quite jauntily Skírnir asks how he can get in to talk to the girl.

Stanza 12 The shepherd is shocked at the outrageous arrogance, even indelicacy, of Skírnir's expectations and insists that he can never talk to Gymir's daughter (he changes Skírnir's less respectful man into góð mæð). The shepherd is one of the ubiquitous warning figures of legend and romance who advise the hero to go back before it is too late (cf. Hamðismál 22, PE I. 172, n. 2), in order to give the audience some measure of the danger ahead.

Stanza 13 Skírnir abandons optimism but not courage. Reflecting that he can only die once, he vaults eikinn fúr yfir (cf. 17/4–6), off-stage.

Stanza 14 The scene changes to Gerðr's parlour, as she exclaims at the earthquake of Skírnir's landing.

Stanza 15 Her maid meanwhile is peeping outside, watching a man getting off his horse and the horse grazing on their grass. She reports this to her mistress.

Apparently there is nothing remarkable to her about either the man or the horse; it is just astonishing that they are there at all. (On the possible omission of the second helmingr see commentary ad loc.)

In common courtesy Gerðr bids the girl invite the visitor in and offer him their mead, but—aside, secretly to herself—she murmurs her suspicion that this unexpected visitor could be no other than her brother's killer—the husband that destiny would force upon her. Gerðr is no simpleton.

When (presumably) Skírnir enters, she questions him graciously—despite her suspicions—as to his origins and why he has, quite alone, crossed the flames to visit them.

Stanza 18 Skírnir disclaims all the kindred she suggests for him—No, not of the álfar or the æsir or the vanir—and yet he has crossed the flames to visit them. His formal repetition of Gerðr's words with a negative implies an apotropaic refusal to identify himself. Just so Sigurðr refuses to admit to any known origins—'I have gone about as a motherless son, no father have I'—when the dying Fáfir asks his name (Fáfnismál 2). Sigurðr too emphasizes that he acts alone: geng ek æ einn saman. Skírnir does not wish Gerðr to have any identity to curse him by, if he must in the end coerce her. To cover this embarrassing fact, he speeds on without delay to his mission.

Stanza 19 With the dexterity of a conjuror he produces from somewhere about his person the golden apples of immortality (if there are eleven of them, then the feat is even more impressive): golden bribes to dazzle a girl indeed, but full of religious meaning, if the girl would see it. The eternity of the gods will be in Gerðr's hands if she accepts the apples and Freyr with them.

Stanza 20 Gerðr roundly refuses. She sees nothing of this 'religious meaning', she sees only that she is being manipulated. She notes the deprecating, almost simpering style of Skírnir's approach and the covered diction—frið at kaup . . . óleiðastan—and decides to have nothing to do with it. However long her life and Freyr's could be, she would never cohabit with him for any of it.

Stanza 21 Without any comment—unless it is the resigned þá of 21/1—Skírnir then offers the magical ring of life-renewal that Baldr was given, that will ensure a perpetual, well-regulated reproduction of itself, continuing circles of fresh life for the world. It was burnt with Baldr, but burnt gold comes back to life—as Gullveig did, and Baldr will (Völuspá 22, 59). When, as Freyr's wife, she owns this ring, she has the source of the world's undying vitality.

Stanza 22 But why should Gerðr want a ring that produces more and more gold? Her father's inestimable stores of submarine gold—those that light up the ocean for his feasts (see commentary to Völuspá 36/8, Lokasenna prose line 1)—can well suffice her. Freyr's future plans are of no concern to her. She refuses to rise from the depths for him.

Stanza 23 Now Skírnir is obliged to turn to physical threats. He makes her look at the spells marked on his sword: with this he will behead her.

Stanza 24 Gerðr refuses to be tyrannized. If it is a fight Skírnir wants, her father will fight him.

Stanza 25 Skírnir forces her to look at the spellbound sword again. Against this sword—the word of the sun—the giant cannot fight and live . . .

But a fight is the last thing Skírnir wants: it would not advance Freyr's desires in the least. His temptations have failed, his coercion has failed: he will now try the power of insidious and loathsome fear—based upon home truths.

3. Skírnir's curse (26–36)

Stanza 26 Acting swiftly before this clever girl can think of another retort, Skírnir now moves closer to her, completely changing his techniques. He strikes her, not with a sword, but lightly with a stick, a magic stick 'of taming', he tells her. He unfolds gradually a curse directed against her sanity of mind, her body's growth, and all the social nurture that human life thrives on. There is no attempt, or wish, to distinguish her as a giant maiden from a human maiden, a part of the world of gumna synir (26/5). Her feelings are conceived of as human feelings, but in a mythological context. Skírnir's curse is a human nightmare.

He designs the progress of her destruction in stages:

1. First there is loneliness, banishment from the human world (26/4–6). We know from Hávamál what this deprivation would be, not only of gladness—

Ungr var ek forðom,	Young I was once,
fór ek einn saman;	I walked alone;
þá varð ek villr vega.	then I lost my way.
Auðigr þóttumz	Rich I thought myself
er ek annan fann:	when I met another:
maðr er mannz gaman.	man's delight is man.	(47)

—but of cultivation of mind—

Maðr af manni	Man from man
verðr at máli kuðr,	grows skilled in speech,
en til dælskr af dul.	and from self-seclusion
	too stultified.	(57)

These are two deprivations that Skírnir keeps constantly before Gerðr.

Stanza 27 2. From this loneliness and torpor will grow a manic hatred of life: she will crouch at the margin of the worlds, turning her back upon the world of the living, morbidly attracted to the world of the dead. The sight of food—fuel of life—will make her shudder with loathing. An extreme anorexia.

3. Next there will be travesty, her identity will be mockingly transformed. In the chthonic world she longed for she will be ostracized, a monstrosity that makes giants stare in amazement, a gargoyle guarding with shrieking jaws the barred gates of Hel (see commentary ad loc.). All eyes will be riveted upon her—she will become more famous guarding Hel than Heimdallr guarding the gods! Stanza 28

4. Then there will be dementia, neurasthenia, the collapse of all emotional control. She will be like an idiot and howl, tortured by her feelings, overwhelmed by tears. Skírnir now makes her sit, to prepare her for her weakness, mesmerize her the more—as Hamlet mesmerizes his mother— Stanza 29

'Come, come, and sit you down. You shall not budge.
You go not till I set you up a glass
Where you may see the inmost part of you'

(Hamlet III. iv. 18–20)

and proceeds to paint the despair of Gerðr's life to come, her twofold grief, tvennan trega.

5. Punishment and deprivation in her daily life will deform her body: she will not grow properly. Bullying imps will force her neck down so that she cannot look up, only down to the ground. She will be a plant that never sees the sun. Through sunlessness her movement will be crippled, she will not walk straight. Nowhere to go but the frost-ogres' frozen hall, no choice of anything better—for the girl who had the freedom at deila fé fjoður! Tears will be her only comfort. Stanza 30

6. From the stunting of her bones Skírnir proceeds to her sexual disintegration. Underlying his chosen details there may well be a whole folklore of sex now lost to us. Nevertheless, one surviving piece of information does seem to me to be helpful. The Norwegian and Icelandic Runic Poems tell us that the Purs ('Ogre') rune causes women's sickness (Purs vældr kvinna kvillu, Norwegian), or is women's torment (Purs er kvenna kvöl, Icelandic).⁵ All or any sickness or torment of women could be referred to here: so, in general any illness or pain a woman might feel could be attributed to the influence of a purs. The one specific kvilla or kvöl endured universally by women, however, is menstruation, regarded in innumerable societies past and present as dangerous to the people and their land. In the context of Freyr's wooing, with its fruitful prospects, marriage with a purs implies a life of endless menstruation, endless prohibition of intercourse, endless confinement hidden away from the light of sun and moon (which the menstruating woman would infect should they shine upon her), and shut away from all social life; above all, a life of total infertility. Throughout this nadir of existence Skírnir curses her to be racked with sexual feeling, until she shrivels with despair, a trampled thistle cast out of the world's harvest. That is the double grief, of sexual need and its denial, that he warned her of (29/7).

⁵ Cited from Dickins 24, 28.

We should perhaps ask what was the marital function of the three-headed purs who would be her ver? I suggest that he would be the traditional personification of all the menstrual prohibitions, and that 'intercourse' with him would be total frustration of the instincts of life (which the verb nara, 31/2, implies). To menstruate is to be married to a purs, to fail to be fertile.

Stanza 32 Skírnir now makes sure that she knows he has power to perform all this. His taming stick, he warns her, he selected from a living, sappy tree in the forest: the magic in it is a vital force. The poet juxtaposes the thistle—dead weed—with the living twig. Having this power manifest in his hand in front of her, Skírnir moves to a new realm of anathema.

Stanza 33 Like an exorcizing priest he pronounces the anger of the gods against her. She is evil: she has brought divine wrath upon herself!

Stanza 34 Invoking giants and gods alike—her world and Freyr's world—to witness his words, he bans all happiness for the recalcitrant girl—in human terms of conviviality, sexual joy, children.

Stanza 35 He turns back then from what she shall not have to what she shall have, as if to settle the matter legally: naming the ogre mate and master destined for her and informing her of her marital conditions. The purs will, naturally, keep her underground (away from the light), lower even than the corpses. Her drink will be goats' urine, handed to her by the household slaves, the untouchables who must serve the menstruating women. Skírnir adds viciously that he will see to it that she gets no better drink. (On the placing of stanza 35 see commentary ad loc.)

Stanza 36 On this deliberate note of animosity—he wants her to be really sure that he is serious: this is not like the abortive threat with the sword—he begins to carve runes to seal his curse. First is the Purs-rune, then three more, which (he says) mean uncontrollable, savage, and quite intolerable sexual need—æði is used of sows in heat—all three terms designed to make Gerðr see herself totally stripped of all dignity. Having played this nasty trick, Skírnir quickly adds: 'I can carve it all off again, of course, should there be any reason to do so'.

4. Gerðr's capitulation (37–39)

Gerðr argues no more. Gently, a little wearily, ironically perhaps—a Stanza 37 player playing her part would have a choice of attitudes—she welcomes Skírnir: 'Be welcome, rather . . .'. Heldr—instead of all this carving of curses, accept this drink, boy, after your great performance. She does not capitulate because he has frightened her, but because she sees some truth in what he says. Some day she must be wedded; he has painted the alternative very well. But she does not embrace the union with Freyr with any warmth (is there a sardonic touch in her choice of the word gaman when she names their tryst, 39/6? It does not suggest love or tender feeling). The Vanir are not the sort of people she had ever imagined caring for.

Businesslike and prompt, wasting no words or time, Skírnir demands Stanza 38 definite details: when does she propose to meet Freyr?

She names a sheltered grove, nine nights from now.

Stanza 39

5. Skírnir's return (40–42)

A brief prose link, or stage direction, shows Skírnir riding home and Freyr already Prose standing outside, asking for news: facts neatly confirmed by the next speech.

Urgently Freyr asks if Skírnir has achieved anything that either—or Stanza 40 both—of them could want (as if there could be any difference in their wishes!).

Coolly, unhurriedly, with a touch of self-satisfaction, perhaps, Skírnir Stanza 41 recites word for word Gerðr's message. What greater success could he have had?

With Gerðr's words, Skírnir has closed his role. Freyr has no thought of Stanza 42 praising him. Self-absorbed as ever, he fastens upon the one flaw in the message that Gerðr has specially designed for him: nine nights to wait! In any marriage three is considered quite enough—how will he bear it?

C. Dramatic techniques

Skírnismál appears to deploy a greater range of dramatic techniques than other Eddic poems. Twice there are asides to the audience (2, 16); there are two soliloquies (13, 42; three if we consider Skírnir's address to the horse as virtually spoken to himself, 10); there are reported circumstances to accompany the action: the description of the shepherd on his mound (11), the noise and tremor of Skírnir's arrival as Gerðr claps her hands over her ears (14), his nonchalant grazing of the horse seen by the ambátt (15), Skírnir describing his actions as he does them (26/1, 36/1). Above all, perhaps, the great range of tones that Skírnir employs, rising to the viciousness of his galdrlag curses, where his horrid repetitions are rich with double meaning, invites a stage performance. Unforgettable on the stage could also be Freyr's telling of his vision of Gerðr (6).

II. Analogues of the Plot

A. The mating of Sky and Earth

One of the oldest Indo-European myths is that of the mating of Sky and Earth at the beginning of time, from which terrestrial life springs—

*Sól skein sunnan
á salar steina—
þá var grund gróin
grænom lauki*

—as the poet of Völuspá 4 sees it.

In the fragments of Pherecydes (sixth century BC) the wedding of Zas (Zeus) and Chthonie (the Earth Spirit) is described; he makes her a wedding veil on which he has embroidered Land and Sea (Ge and Ogenos) to honour her as his bride.⁶ Their union results in the creation of the universe: Zas 'changed himself into Eros when about to create'. But there are different ways in which a sky-god may approach his earth-mate. Zas is courteous and helps his underground bride to become attractive to look on. Ouranos, in Hesiod's Theogony, however, appears as a gross rapist, who hates his offspring and makes his consort, Gaia, hate him. The term 'sacred marriage' hardly fits their case, yet that is the way a different society and its poets have seen the mythologem.

By the time the old cosmic legend reaches us in Norse words it has become quite complex. The sky-god, Freyr, has, like Zas, a warm and reverential attitude to his desired Earth. But she has greatly changed. She is not the archaic Chthonie, a rough substructure to be beautified by her resplendent Lord, or a defenceless territory exposed to the will of his Divine Power, but a gleaming treasure already formed, defended by a rival power of wealth, shining back at the sky-god like a reflection of himself. Gerðr is the only partner I know in a 'sacred marriage' who represents an earth that still resides in the sea when the sky woos her. But we know that the emergence of earth from ocean was well established in Norse mythology by the time of Völuspá, and Ægir's submarine feasting were famous, lit as they were by gold. Life under the ocean for those rich beings who lived there was much like life on terra firma, with grass for a horse to graze on, and frosted goblets of mead. Or so it amused the Norsemen to represent it in their dramatic re-enactments and their poems (cf. Grimnismál 7).

⁶ See Diels fragment 2; also Kirk and Raven 61–3; P. Dronke (b), 445–6. Illuminating studies of the sacred marriage are given in Herbert and in Leick (esp. ch. 1, 'The Cosmological Articulation of Sexuality').

There is a poetic and political use of the more conventional version of the 'sacred marriage' theme in Hallfreðr's Hákonardrápa.⁷ Óðinn is traditionally husband of Jörð, 'Earth', here taking the Viking conqueror's role. Hákon copies Óðinn, luring the land of Norway beneath him by the persuasions of war—the earth willingly submits herself under him—then turning the rape to legal marriage, when he weds her, the 'sister of Wealth' (Auðs systur). The 'broad-faced' bride here, with hair of pine-needles and braided corn, is the landscape of Norway (Chthonie wearing Zas' wedding gift). The poet of Skírnismál chose Gymir's daughter, not Jörð, as the god's bride, because she could embody the 'sun-from-the-sea's-depths', the gleaming golden underwater earth, Gefjun's djúpröðull, that truly complements the sun from the sky, Freyr's álfröðull (see commentary to 4/4). Only this choice that the poet made could have given him Freyr's luminous vision of the far-away girl (6) and supplied the vast funds of gold—'ocean's fire'—that give her her scornful independence (22). That independence motivates the curse.

It is no doubt the poet's representation of the god's destined bride as the rich girl from the sea that has prevented general acceptance of the 'sacred marriage' of Sky and Earth as the basic plot of Skírnismál.

B. A curse on fields and its remedy

Among the Anglo-Saxon charms is one to remedy two troubles that a farmer may encounter,⁸ (a) that his fields refuse to grow well (hī nellap wēl wexan), and (b) that some injurious thing has been done to them by sorcery or witchcraft (þær hwīlc ungedēfe þing ongedōn biþ on drȳ oððe on lyblāce). It could be said, I think, that Gerðr, representing the earth and its fields, is refusing to grow well, when she rejects Freyr and his golden gifts, and that the injurious curse that Skírnir places on her is revealing to her the ugly results that will follow her obstinacy; his magical runes are to make those results doubly sure. The only solution for the dilemma in Skírnismál is that Gerðr should accept the god Freyr and the fecundity he will give her. So too in the Anglo-Saxon charm:

Hāl wes þū, folde,	Be blessed, earth,
fīra mōdor,	mother of men,
bēo þū grōwende	may you be fecund

⁷ See the edition and discussion of the poem by Davidson; also Ström (b) and (c).

⁸ Storms 172–7.

on Godes fæpme,	in God's embrace,
fōdre gefyllled	filled with food
fīrum tō nytte.	for the benefit of men.

The farmer in the charm is haunted by the conviction that harmful magic can be used against his fields: he prays that God and his saints will protect the fruits of his land 'from every enemy and from every one of all the evils of those witchcrafts sown throughout the land' (wið ealra fēonda gehwæne, / and . . . wið ealra bealwa gehwylc / þāra lyblāca geond land sāwen). As further security he prays that there may be 'no woman so clever of speech, no man so powerful (in spells), who can distort the words thus spoken' (ne sýn nān tō þæs cwidol wif, ne tō þæs cræftig man / þæt āwendan ne mæge word þūs gecwedene). Skírnir's curse upon Gerðr would seem to fulfil the farmer's worst fears. Against such menacing, deliberately hostile sorcery the farmer, with God's grace, prepares a counter-sorcery of symbolic magic, singing of psalms, invocation of the Earth Mother—Erce, Erce, Erce, eorþan mōdor—which he calls a 'charm' (gealdor), 'to wake up these crops for our worldly good' (āweccan þās wæstmas ūs tō woruldnytte).

In both Skírnismál and the Anglo-Saxon charm, within the promise of the union of Earth and Heaven, there is the threat of its failure. In the traditions behind Skírnismál there will have been superstitious fears for the health of the land—and the landvættir—not unlike those of the Anglo-Saxon farmer (see commentary to 28/5–6; also AR § 228). For the drama of the poem the evil sorcery threatening the land has become a weapon wielded by the emissary of the god of fertility himself to force the stubborn female to see her own good.

C. The love-spell

In a type of love-spell from late Antiquity a lover places a spell upon the woman he desires, in which she is his victim, forced by his power to grow mad with love for him and to seek him out with insatiable passion: in Skírnir's words, with ergi, æði, and ópoli (36). Greek magical texts from the fourth and fifth century AD prescribe fierce spells by which daimones will be sent to seize the beloved:⁹ 'If she is sitting, let her not sit . . . if she is sleeping, let her not sleep, but have me, only me, in her mind, long only for me . . . let her run away from every place and every dwelling, and abandon father, mother, brothers, sisters, till she comes to me, Theôn, kissing me, loving me, Theôn, in ceaseless longing and mad love'; or the spell-caster will burn myrrh and command it to go to the woman and disrupt her life, so that she has only love for him in her mind; the myrrh must enter her body

⁹ See Wortmann; P. Dronke (e), 72–3, from which the following citations in English translation are taken; for the Leiden Lorica see the same article, 61–71 (citations from 62, 64–5).

'through her genitals, and remain in her heart, and burn her entrails, her breast, her liver, her breath, her bones, her marrow, till she comes to me . . .'

Closer to the Norse world, in a MS. of Welsh origin, in a hand of c. 900, is the Latin love-spell known as the Leiden Lorica, which has 'salient parallels in genre and tone . . . among the more sinister love-spells of Graeco-Roman magic' (see note 9). All the body's parts of the beloved are listed to be 'hunted out' for the lover's love, and adjurations call for her heart to be taken from her for his love's sake—pro amore meo.

The parallel between Skírnir's curse of lust and the Greek and Latin love-spells might not have become evident if it were not for the Bergen love-spell which occurs in a magical inscription of the late fourteenth century.¹⁰

ek sendi þér,	I send you,
ek síða þér	I conjure for you
ylgjar ergi ok úpola.	she-wolf's lust and intolerable craving.
Á þér renni úpoli	May that craving catch hold of you,
ok iotuns [MS. ioluns]	and monstrous rage.
móð.
Sittu aldri,	Never sit,
sof þú aldri . . .	never sleep . . .
ant mér sem sjálfri þér.	love me like yourself.

The words ergi ok úpola appear here in the context of a fantasy dream of the total subjection of the loved woman to the spell-caster's love. Skírnir's intentions in using the same threats are harsher. Gerðr will be under the same compulsions as the spell-caster's woman, but there will be no one—not even the spell-caster—to want her desperate body. In planning Skírnir's curse did the poet borrow from love-spells in popular magical-erotic lore that he knew, to describe his love-frustrated earth? Some of the motifs in the Greek papyri appear again in Bergen. Beneath the learned erotic tradition of the Leiden Lorica, with its Celtic and Graeco-Roman literary links, there may also have been a current of unwritten practice.

D. Skírnir's mythological role

Skírnir can only be the sun's ray personified. It is he, not the sun himself, who penetrates deep down to provoke the self-satisfied earth to wedlock. He is the awakening shaft of light and warmth that puts an end to the infertile winter. The pattern of his role is familiar from the fairy-tale human versions of it—the Prince who wakens the sleeping Princess, the Sigurðr who rouses and releases his Sigdrífa—but as a mythological role in Germanic it is unique to Skírnismál.¹¹

¹⁰ See Liestøl 41–53. For remarkable testimony to the international mingling of magical texts see Burnett, illustrating the appearance of Norse runes in a 14 c. Italian MS. of a Latin translation of an Arabic treatise on astral magic.

III. The Dating of Skírnismál

The myths upon which Skírnismál depends for its story and structure are among the most ancient myths in the world: (a) the raising of earth out of water; (b) the sacred marriage of earth and sky; (c) the descent of the sun into the dangerous underworld of night and death, sinking into the sea to rise each day triumphant; (d) the awakening of the earth to life by the sun-ray's penetration of the barriers around her.

Outside Skírnismál interest in these old myths appears to be slight. Raising of earth out of water is employed as a motif in Völuspá 4 to anticipate the cyclic return after Ragnarøk, but, for its fantasy, the formation of earth out of a giant body has proved more popular with poets. The theme of the sacred marriage of God and Earth occurs only in the political-allegorical play upon it in Hákonardrápa (Skírnismál Introduction II. A), and the God is no longer the god of sun and fertility current in Hallfreðr's time, namely Freyr, but the god of warrior kings, Óðinn. No Germanic source other than Skírnismál represents the sun's night descent as dangerous: there is no hint of ordeal about Ing's departure 'over the wave' in the Old English Rune Poem. Yet the sun's battle with night is one of the great religious themes in other religions (notably Egyptian¹²), and becomes a metaphor of death and resurrection in early Christianity.¹³ It must be for this battle that Freyr, the sun-god, has his sword 'that fights of itself against the giant race', that is, against the giant world of death. In Skírnismál the sword is correctly present in the night invasion of giantland, as one of the traditional features, but it is not of any use.¹⁴ In Völuspá that sword is of use, but in the hands of the giants (Völuspá 50/3-4, see commentary ad loc.): the gods will not be victorious on that night of death. In Skírnismál the sword's bride-winning function is brushed aside in favour of ¹¹ See AR § 323.

¹² See Frankfort (b), 154, 157; The Book of the Dead 411, 413.

¹³ Fine instances of the use of this metaphor are to be found in Dölger; see esp. 336-63, § 20, 'Christus als Sonne im Totenreich'; 364-79, § 21, 'Jesus als Sonne der Auferstehung und Sol Invictus'. See also Carey 33.

¹⁴ The sword is an ancient male sexual symbol (as S. A. Mitchell, 115, well notes), and thus perfectly appropriate in its place in the sexual drama as the aggressive will of the god. This Gerðr can defy when so rudely threatened, but the insidious image of her deadly life without him breaks her will.

the sun-ray's sexual realism. It is his penetrating, unsparing analysis that determines earth to defeat death by marriage and be no longer a woman 'without a shadow'. The solar horse of Freyr, Blóðughófi, 'Bloody Hoof', makes no appearance in his solar role except in Skírnismál (though the sacred dedication of horses to Freyr is well attested). In Vafþrúðnismál 11-14 Blóðughófi has become two pretty creatures, one with shining mane bringing dawn, the other with dew-dropping bit bringing night: neither encountering any danger. Blóðughófi was, however, a war-horse, ridden by bani Belja, Atriði—a duelling god, a 'mounted attacker' (SnE 170), and I suggest that his bloodstained hoofs came from the battlefield¹⁵ and became the popular term for the last blood-red streak of sunset as the great horse of the sun plunges over the horizon into the night.

Skírnismál retains as stage properties the horse and the sword of once vital myths. Professionally out of date for court poets of the late tenth century, no doubt, the old myths survived in popular drama, conservative in its tastes, always expecting the solicitous parents, the moping, love-sick, ineffectual son, the sharp-witted ruthless page, the horse, the sword, the apples, the defiant girl, and the terrifying climax of the curse. It is, I suggest, popular demand that has kept the old 'sacred marriage' myth extant for us in mythological, not allegorical, terms. In a 'sacred marriage' there is (or ought to be) no drama: the earth of Norway is pleased to open her arms to Hákon-Óðinn. But when there is opposition, then the dialectic begins, and with it, dramatic life. The poet of Skírnismál is composing a drama with Gerðr and Skírnir at its centre, and the theme of life and non-life for the woman, the goddess Earth, is argued by the man. He is the emissary of the sun, the ray that has cut through all the barriers and is now actually striking the girl with his power—ek þik drep. For his arguments he chooses the grotesque and appalling images of the giant world, its ugliness and violence—as we can see it in Dórsdrápa and Hymiskviða—with deprivation of every dignified tradition of human behaviour—such as we may see in Hávamál. He uses above all the physical significance of Purs to confirm the physical truth of what he is saying.

It is not possible, I think, that Skírnismál could have been composed for any royal marriage.¹⁶ No royal bride would have endured the ill omen and ignominy of the curse—'Be like a crushed thistle'—or the portrait of the disintegrating, howling girl—herself, if she is not careful. Young Norwegian heiresses were quick to note unaristocratic manners (as Haraldr hárfagri found, when a rich girl scorned his arrogant and presumptuous sexual approaches, Hkr I. 96). Nor would a new king allow himself to ¹⁵ The blood on the hoof is more appropriately that of the vanquished enemy than that of a foot injury to the horse (as in the Merseburg Charm; AR §§ 451-3).

¹⁶ As Steinsland (c) argues, esp. 307-8.

be laughed at as Freyr in the final stanza, all but turned down by his consort. It is difficult indeed to see any reference to kingship in the poem.

Skírnismál must have developed before the imaginative vitality of pagan traditions had died away in Norway and Iceland: I say developed, because it is such a subtle amalgam of themes, the product, perhaps, of a century or more of popular and poetic dramatic cooperation. The Anglo-Saxon analogues suggest a time of origin when the Norse and the insular races were on familiar speaking terms and enjoyed enriching their stories of entertainment from each other. The final poem that we have, however, does not depend on collective labour, but on the swift imagination of a highly individual poet, who rejoices in his theme.

Whether Skírnismál might have been composed in its extant form as late as the twelfth or thirteenth century is difficult to determine with solid evidence. As in the case of Lokasenna, we can only say that among all the poetic material composed in those centuries in Iceland, there is nothing comparable to Skírnismál. The genius for composing in Eddic verse is no longer there. A case in point is Svipdagsmál. Thick with phrases and echoes of Skírnismál, it has nothing of its elegant colloquialism, lucidity, speed, wit, sureness of structure. As Robinson has shown, on manuscript evidence that poem is probably to be dated to the late thirteenth century.¹⁷ Though the model of Skírnismál must have been ringing in the ears of the Svipdagsmál poet, his poem amply demonstrates that by the thirteenth century the art of composing Eddic verse was an antiquarian, not a living, exercise.

Although I cannot myself discern a motif of kingship in Skírnismál, it is in connection with Scandinavian kingship that the image of god/king as the embracing lover of his land survives into at least the thirteenth century in poetry. Havelok is the divinely protected Danish king's heir, who dreams—as he sleeps beside his royal wife, Goldborw, heiress of England—that, as he sits on a huge mound—no doubt the burial mound of Danish kings—he begins to possess Denmark and embrace it 'with his long bones'. And when he draws back his arms every living thing in the land clings fast to them:

Al þat eueire in Denemark liueden
On mine armes faste clyueden

(Havelok 1300–1)

and the strong castles let their keys fall at his feet. Just as Hákon embraced Norway with the approval of the pagan gods, so Havelok embraces Denmark with that of the Christian God. If Skírnismál was fostered in kingless Iceland in the early Christian centuries, it is not surprising that no theme of political sovereignty is developed in the poem.

¹⁷ See esp. 397–406.

IV. The Texts of Skírnismál

The complete text of the poem (under the title För Skírnir, 'Skírnir's journey') is preserved in R. The prose prologue and stanzas 1–27 are preserved in A. The final stanza (42) is cited in SnE 41, with a variant reading probably stemming from Snorri.

It is commonly agreed that the Eddic texts in R and A go back to the same base text, X.¹⁸ In the case of the text of Skírnismál, however, it is hardly correct to regard R and A as of almost equal value,¹⁹ even though both may have derived from X. The scribe of R is more perceptive of the meaning of the words he is copying than is the scribe of A. A leaves us with a meaningless text at 8/1–2, 17/5, and with a badly damaged, obviously unoriginal, text at 27/3–4. He has not noted the parallelism between sátt, 7/6, and sætt, 23/6. He omits two repetitions in the text which sustain the vitality of the dialogue structure, (a) cutting 18, Skírnir's response to Gerðr's question, returning her own words (17) to her, and (b) cutting out the echoes of question and answer in 21 and 22 by simply attaching the first three lines of 21 to the last three of 22. I do not think these omissions are simply careless, a slip of the eye from one line to another. A is not a careless scribe (he has at least ten correct readings where R has minor error or omission), but he is interfering, rather rigidly trained, and not very clever. He reverses phrases to make them conventional (e.g. placing ása before álfa in 17/1–2, as in Völuspá 49, Prýmskviða 7, Lokasenna 2, 30, and creating a new 27/1: Ár skaltu sitia out of 27/2: skaltu ár sitia, no doubt under the influence of famous stanza openings such as Völuspá 3/1, Helgakviða Hundingsbana I 1/1, Guðrúnarkviða I 1/1, Sigurðarkviða in skamma 1/1; on the poetic effect of these changes see commentary to 17/1, 27/1); he normalizes word-order (6/2, 23/5) and cuts out minor words that seem to him unnecessary (e.g. 13/2: heldr en at klökkva sé becomes in A en klökkva sé; some readers prefer this, but it is less likely to be the original reading). We are perhaps fortunate in having two scribes of such different temperaments to sharpen our approach to the text.

Two flaws common to R and A are probably an inheritance from X: (a) the omission of 12/3, which is not signalled in either text, (b) the reading ellifo for ellilyfs in 19/1, 20/1. See also commentary to 15 and 24/6–7.

¹⁸ See JH II. vi § 2.

¹⁹ JH: 'Hvad tekstens kvalitet angår, er de to håndskrifter omtrent jævnbyrdige'; Skm-Modell 37: 'Es gibt keine wesentlichen Unterschiede zwischen dem Wortlaut von R und A'.

COMMENTARY ON THE TEXT

Prose Prologue

line 1 Hliðskjálf does not occur in Eddic verse and only once in skaldic (in a fragment, SnE 91, of unidentified context or date). As a concept Hliðskjálf, 'Gate-(High)Shelf' is no doubt very old, combining the symbolism of the gate as entry into another world, and the high peak or platform as attainment of wider vision. See commentary to Akv 14/2: liðskjálfar diúpar; for invaluable analysis and discussion see Kiil, and especially Tolley (a), 335–42 (in relation to Norse evidence of shamanic practices). See Skm Introd 1. A.

line 4 Skírnir, 'Clear-Shining One', is the ray of light and warmth that the sun-god sends out to the earth (see Skm Introd 11. D). He has his master's radiance (skírom Frey, Grím 43/5). Skíringssalur, Oslofjord, is thought to be an ancient centre of Freyr worship (AR §§ 328).

lines 4–5 Njörðr... Skaði: only here are these named as Freyr's parents (Skaði is not named in the verse; Njörðr is, 39, 41). Well established is the comedy of the marriage and divorce of Njörðr and Skaði (SnE 30, 31, 80, 81). But Skaði is only recorded as having sons by Óðinn (in Hál). As Davidson, 56–62, lucidly presents this complex problem, Eyvindr has made Freyr a son of Óðinn and Skaði (cf. Hál 3 where their son is alluded to as skattferir, 'tribute bringer'; according to Hkr 1. 24 for three years the people's skatt was poured into the windows of dead Freyr's haugr). In this way Eyvindr made Hákon's ancestry go back to both Óðinn and Yngvi-Freyr. Snorri preserves both fathers for Yngvi-Freyr: Óðinn in SnE 7, Njörðr in Hkr 1. 13, Óláfs Saga helga 4, under the influence of his variant sources. For the purposes of Skm Freyr has been given a settled home background: traditions of Njörðr's paternity must have been too firmly rooted to be disturbed by Eyvindr's innovations, and the famous duet of Skaði and Njörðr, lamenting each other's residential tastes (SnE 30), must have established them firmly as a married pair in popular memory. The discrepancy in the prose prologue, that Njörðr tells Skírnir to approach Freyr and then Skaði utters the stanza giving the order in poetic detail, suggests the fitting-together of a summary of the poem in prose with a version of the poem, in which the first speakers differed. In an oral version either parent or both might utter the verse.

1/2 Alliteration is lacking; there seems no simple way of repairing it.

1/5 fróði: I am convinced by the small but sufficient evidence that a double sense is intended here, a play on (a) fróðr, 'wise', and (b) fróðr, 'fecund'. Fróðr (b) I see reflected in the name Fróði for Freyr's alter ego, the wealthy and peace-blessed king (Hkr 1. 24–5; AR § 460–2), and in the pun on fróðr in Háv 141: Pá nam ek frævaz / ok fróðr vera / ok vaxa ok vel hafaz, 'Then I began to sprout and be fecund in knowledge and grow and prosper'. To see only the meaning 'wise' in fróðr would be to weaken Óðinn's joke, that his peculiar form of fertility is wisdom: see all the generations of words and works that are producing themselves for him—orð mér aforði / orðs leitaði... King Fróði cannot have been named for his wisdom when he lost the Golden Mill through his folly (Grott). A stem fróð-, 'fertile', occurs also in Swedish frodas, 'to grow exuberantly', frodighet, 'abundance', with many figurative uses.

1/6 ofreiði: usually taken as a weak adj. (LP; DH list many instances under Vsp 18/4); ofreiðr would be awkward after enn fróði and before afi.

afi: in everyday language afi would be 'grandfather'. In legal phrases concerning inheritance, however, it is used of the succession of male heirs: þat hefir fylgt afi eptir afa, 'which male heir after male heir has had possession of' DN iv. 848; sú er ein [jörð] er afi hefir afa leift, 'that constitutes a single patrimony which male heir has bequeathed to male heir', Gulapingslög, NGL 1. 270. Afi may have been used of Freyr in religious contexts that have not survived, to emphasize his patronage of land and of male succession (note the emphasis in Ytal and Hál on the relationship of king or jarl to Freyr: Freys áttungr, Freys afspringr). In Skm I suggest afi is deliberately used in this domestic setting to imply 'the heir apparent', the favoured son.

2/5–6 I have attempted by punctuation to indicate a dramatic difference of tone from that of the same words in 1/5–6: Skírnir is wryly parodying the parents' inept approach.

3/2 fólkwaldi: elsewhere a human military title and an old Gmc name (cf. Widsið 27: Fin Folcwalding / [wēold] Frēna cynne ('Fin son of Folcwalda ruled the Frisian race')). At Baldr's funeral (Húsdr 7) Freyr rides his golden boar and marshals his troops, folkum stjýrir (presumably in funeral parade, as for Attila or Beowulf). Freyr's martial reputation may relate to his association with the boar from very ancient times. Tacitus, Germ xlv, records that the Aestii (East Baltic), who worshipped the mother of the gods (matrem deum), i.e. had a Vanir-type religion, wore images (formas) of wild boars in war, believing them to be a greater protection than weapons or armour (cf. the Swedish and English boar-helmets). See commentary to Vsp 51/5.

4/4 álfrqðull: rqðull alone is a heiti for 'sun' (probably related to Lat rota, 'wheel'). Freyr is lord of Álfheimr, realm of the living spirits of the glorious dead ancestors; his sun could well be named after the radiance and immortality of his elves, as it rises each day from the otherworld of the dead, Sol Invictus (see UD (b), 264). I suggest that the term may have been chosen here because the god has just fallen in love with the djúprqðull, 'sun of the sea-depth', his golden reflection, Gerðr (see Skm Introd 11. A). The famous verses of Bragi would have been as well known to the poet of Skm as they were to Snorri (SnE 8, 134, 155, etc.).

4/6 munom: there is an echoing play on the contextually varying sense of munr, 'love', 'desire', 'pleasure', 'satisfaction', 'need', throughout the poem, with the switch of pronoun—minn, þinn—or Gerðr's emphatic at mannskis munom repeated (see 4, 5, 20, 24, 26, 35, 40).

6/1 Gymis: see commentary to Lks prose prologue line 1, Vsp 36/8.

6/2 ek sá: other instances where there is no inversion of subject and verb, when that would be expected in prose, are numerous in Skm, suiting the emphasis the poet requires (cf. 20/2, as against 19/2; 21/1, 24/2, 26/1, 32/1, 4, etc.).

6/5–6 af—lqgr: assuming lýsto implicit after lqgr, 'air and water caught light off (af) her arms, light streaming from the place where she was (þaðan)'; a succinct picture of the source and movement of the radiance. Human Norse lovers also saw their beloved as a sun, or a lighted candle; cf. Guðrún Lundaól of Lundar in Norway, whom Jarl Hákon tried to abduct, Hkr 1. 293–4, and Oddný Eykyndill of Hjörsey in Iceland, whom Björn Hítðelakappi loved, Bjarn 174.

7/2 en manni hveim, 'than [any girl] to any man[']s liking', 'she pleases me more than any girl ever pleased any man': so I should understand the ellipsis. See Skm Intro 1. B ad loc.

7/6 sátt: A reads samt, 'together'. I have chosen the R reading, which covers both the 'togetherness', 'reconciliation', of lovers and the abandonment of family feud between Freyr and Gerðr; see Skm Intro 1. B ad loc.

8/1, 4: Mar...sverð: Skirnir asks for the two mythological trappings of the sun-god, the solar horse and the solar sword; see Skm Intro III; also commentary to Vsp 19/2, 50/3–4, Lks 42/1–3; UD (b), 265, nn. 4–6.

8/3 vísan vafroga: I have taken vísan animistically: the flame 'knows' who is permitted to cross it, as the flame round Brynhildr's hall sinks down when Sigurðr approaches it (Vols 49 (23): eldr sloknaði / fyrir qðlingi, / logi allr lægðisk / fyrir lofgjörnum, 'the fire died out before the prince, the whole flame sank low before the hero ambitious for praise'). On traditions of the flame-wall see UD (b), 263–6.

vafrogi is copied in Fjolsvinnsmál 31, where again it encircles a maiden's hall. ON vafra, 'to wander to and fro' is not frequent, used for example of ghosts; Fritzer s.v. OE adj. wæfre (possibly wæfre) is common: used of the flames of the fiery furnace of the three children in Daniel 240 (wylm þæs wæfran lîges, 'surge of the swaying flame'), also of the roving ghoul, Grendel, and of Beowulf's restless mind (Beowulf 1331, 2420).

10/2 mál kveð ek okr fara: the solar horse must keep to his timetable.

10/4 þursa: I take the mountains to represent the edge of the earth, already dewy with evening, behind which the sun-horse will sink and then travel in ogres' territory till Gymir's central palace is reached. To read þyria þjóðyfir would imply that the sun had not yet set, but was lingering over the peoples of the earth.

13/1–2 Kostir—sé: 'The choices are better than that whimpering, being afraid, should be one of them'; klökkva, 'to be soft, timid, querulous'.

13/4 eino dægri: I have taken the emphasis to be 'just one skapadægr, one fated moment of day or night, has been fixed for me: thank goodness there is only one!' One could read, more nobly, 'I am fated to die one day or night: if this is the moment, let me not be cowardly'. An actor could choose his tone.

14/1 Hvat er þat hlymia: MSS. Hvat er þat hlym hlymia is hardly possible, unless we assume a neuter hlym, 'noise', which is not attested; masc. hlymr is several times recorded (LP). There has clearly been some confusion in the MS. on which the two texts of Skm depend, since R has hlymia also in 14/2. For the phrase as emended cf. 17/1: Hvat er þat álfa. For fuller analysis see Skm-Modell 64–5.

15 The only three-line stanza in the poem. It is possible that a second hellingr has been lost, in which the servant girl makes some additional comment—such as, 'he has a shining sword in his hand'—which might make Gerðr's sudden intuition that it is her bróðurbani seem less abrupt. However, the girl's three lines are pleasing as they are.

16/2 okkarn: Gerðr refers to the presence of herself and her maid, not to herself and Gymir (as Skm-Modell 66).

16/6 bróðurbani: see commentary to Lks 17/4–6.

17/1 álfa: I suggest the poet has reversed the traditional order, ása...álfa, to exploit the 'elvish' associations of álfr that fit Skirnir's sudden, radiant appearance from nowhere. Ása does not convey such an image (see commentary to Vsp 49/1–2). For comparable interchange of question and negative answer, see the lines quoted by Snorri (SnE 39): 'Hvat þar flýgr? hvat þar ferr? ... 'Né ek flýg, þó ek fer. ...'

17/3 vísra vana: the Vanir's wisdom is particularly their foreknowledge, through their command of seiðr and their links with the world of the dead as deities of fertility (cf. Þrym 15/3–4, though Heimdallr is not traditionally one of the Vanir; also Sigrdr 18/5–7).

19, 20 ellilyfs: Iðunn, who has the apples that keep the gods young, is alluded to as mey...þás ellilyf ása...kunni, 'the girl who had skill in the gods' medicine for age' (Haustr 9). While the MS. reading ellifo, 'eleven', could be explained as one for each of the gods (eleven in Hyndl 29), this is less apt than a promise of everlasting life for Gerðr, should she accept Freyr: for she is, mythologically, the earth. She seizes upon lifa—the last word in Skirnir's speech—and refuses any life with Freyr, long or short. If Freyr and Skirnir have wished to turn this scene into one of seduction (cf. Skm-Modell 69), Gerðr utterly routs their intentions. If the story of Eve has been of influence upon the poet, as Steinsland (c), 109–16, suggests, he has turned it to splendid effect. For further references to legendary apples see UD (b), 252, n. 8.

19/3 Gerðr is most probably a fem. formation based on garðr, 'enclosure', intended to anticipate the human dwelling-place of Miðgarðr, surrounded by the sea from which it emerged (cf. vb. gerða, 'to encircle, protect' land with ships, LP). See Motz (b), 124–6, for fuller discussion.

21/1–6 Baug: the story of the forging of this ring by the dwarf Eitri is told in SnE 122–3; Óðinn places it on Baldr's pyre, SnE 66; Baldr in Hel gives it to Hermóðr to return to Óðinn til minja, SnE 67.

driúpa: for the sense 'to drop from in birth, be born', cf. vargdropi, 'son of an outlaw/wolf', Sigrðr 35, LP.

22/4–6 era — Gymis: both MSS. have this reading, though the alliteration suggests that the lines should be reversed (and so give, I think, a more elegant text).

23/1 mæki: see Skm Introd n. 14.

23/2 málfán: i.e. marked with signs that had magic force (Skirnir would not be referring simply to decoration here; cf. Sigsk 4: mæki málfán of the separating sword in the bed which had such fatal consequences). For inscribed sword-blades see Ellis Davidson (a), 42–50.

24/6–7 vígs — tíði: stylistically poor, a pointless change of metre; a final sixth line has probably been lost and clumsily replaced in fornyrðislag.

26/1 Tamsvendi: for gen. of adj. in compounds cf. feginslúðr, 'mill-frame of joyfulness', Grott 5; Glaðsheimr, 'Realm of Content', Grím 8.

27 – 36 The ljóðahátt metre becomes deliberately roughened here with interjections of the 'spell metre', galdralag. See Skm Introd 1. c.

27/1–2 Ara þúfo á: this is not an ordinary eagle's outpost, his favoured mound for spying prey, but the mythical hillock that marks the sky's end, where the giant-eagle, Hrævelgr, 'Corpse Swallower', starts the winds blowing by the beating of his wings (Vafþ 37). Gerðr will sit there savouring the breath from the dead, turning her eyes from the world.

27/4 snugga, 'to catch the scent of something', 'to catch the scent with pleasure, hanker after something' (see Morkinskinna 309: Snæliga snuggir, sveinar, kváðu Finnar; áttu andra fala, 'It smells like snow, lads, said the Lapps; you ought to buy snow-shoes'; Gyðinga Saga 81: Iudei skyldu ekki þurfa til þess at snugga, at nokkuru tíma komi undir þá kongdómriinn, 'The Jews should have no need to let this hope fill their nostrils that the kingdom will at some time fall into their hands'). These appear to be the few instances of snugga in ON.

28/1 undrsíonom: only here in ON; OE wundorsēon, 'wondrous spectacle', only in Beowulf 995; cf. OHG gloss 'spectaculum', wuntar-siuni. The sense in Skm is ironic, not laudatory as in Beowulf.

28/3 Hrímnr: a standard name for a giant (cf. Hrímgrímnir 35, and the giantess Hrímgerðr, HHv 21, etc.). Hrím- relates him to the aboriginal frost-ogres, hrímbursar, as well as to the rusty blackness of hrím, 'soot'. So his name evokes an icy and sordid presence.

hari: hap. leg. in ON, but frequent in Norw dialect, signifying 'stand silent and gazing vacantly'; H. Ross. As Larrington, 8, well notes: 'The spectator has power over the object; he chooses when to look and when to stop looking; the object lacks such choice . . . Thus for Gerðr, to be stared at makes explicit her loss of autonomy.'

28/5–6 Viðkunnari — goðom: I take this as ironic (in the same tone as undrsíonom). Heimdallr, 'glorious' and 'hallowed' (Vsp 2/7, 27/4) guards Ásgarðr (SnE 32–3; Loki's travesty of Heimdallr, Lks 48, is not relevant here, as Skm-Modell 78 suggests; in Gmc tradition sentinels were highly valued men of rank, e.g. the Danish coastguard, Beowulf 333–55). Gerðr will 'guard' the corpse-gates — nágrindr, 35/3 — with her gaping, shouting mouth, like a gaping dragon's head on a ship or the open-mouthed man's head guarding the side of the Oseberg wagon. The menace of 'gaping heads and yawning jaws' is clear from the old law that ships had to remove such figure-heads before approaching land lest the landvættir, guardians of the health of the land, should be terrified away (Landn 313). When Egill set up a horse-head as a níð against Eiríkr blóðøx he wedged the jaws wide open and turned it towards Eiríkr's land against the landvættir (Egil 171). Gerðr will be just such a menace to terrestrial life as those effigies. That Gerðr will gape from grindr, 'fences', 'barred gates', relates her to the túnriður, 'fence-riders', shape-changed witches, who would ride on the 'cattle-grindr, with their hair loose, in troll's shape', described in the West Götaland Laws (Wessén 29; Ljunggren; Strömbäck 168–9). That gapa could include also raucous and jeering shouts is suggested by the noun gap; Þá var svá mikil háreysti ok gap, at engi maðr mátti þar málum sínum fram koma, 'there was so much rowdiness and hooting [at the þing] that no one could get his case heard', Sneglu-Halla Þáttr 288.

29/1–3 Tópi — trega: as tópi, ópi do not occur elsewhere, their case is uncertain; but simplest is to assume that both are nominatives, loose subjects (with típsull, óþoli, and tár) of vaxi. Or we can suppose an unfinished syntax: that Skirnir is calling down four horrors upon her, each accompanied by a prod of his tamsvöndr, each one a tregi that will cause her tears to grow. Either way his meaning will be clear.

Tópi is commonly assumed to be related to modern Scandinavian words meaning 'fool', 'dolt' (Norw taape, Dan taabe; see Hellquist s.v. tåp). The phonetic relationship is very hard to parallel.

ópi must be a variant of óp, 'shout', 'loud weeping' (cf. OE wōp, wēpan).

típsull occurs nowhere else but may well be related to OE teosu neut., 'plague', 'affliction', teoswian, 'to harm', 'to torment'; possibly both the ON and OE relate to taijsjan*, 'to pull apart' (cf. OE tāsan, tāsel, 'teasel'; OHG zeisan, zeisal). In Gerðr's context presumably an insistent sexual anguish tearing her.

óþoli: see commentary to 36/1-4.

29/6 sútbreka: I have emended MS. sús- to a known ON term for grief, sút, rather than to OE sūsl, 'torment', not found elsewhere in ON; -breki is 'wave', 'breaker'. I have translated sváran-breka as 'heavy sea', since in English that implies a sea with heavy swell or high waves. I think it unlikely that ON brek, 'importunate demand', 'wilful desire', is involved in sús/sútbreka, as the usual usages of brek imply a certain triviality not suited to the context in Skm.

29/7 tvenman trega: if this does not simply mean 'doubled, intensified grief', it refers to Gerðr's threatened dilemma, that she will feel sexual anguish—tiðsull ok óþoli—but will have no means of satisfying, exorcizing it (cf. 31/1-5 and commentary ad loc.).

30/1 Tramar: not recorded elsewhere in ON, but found in ModÍcel and Norw for 'evil spirits', 'trolls'.

gneyþa, 'to cause to be gneypr, jutting forward', especially of the head. When Egill is full of grief and wrath at his brother's death (Egil 143), he sits erect opposite the king, but with his neck bent over—var gneyþtr mjök—presumably gazing at the ground, while his eyebrows move into a fixed menace, one up, one down. To be gneyþtr is not a natural position, but forces the eyes to look downwards. For an account of an attempt to straighten a head gneypt from a wound in the neck see Eyrb 129-30. The suggestion that gneyþa refers to rape (Bibire 32) has no parallel that I know. It would not fit well with the suggestion that she lacks sexual intercourse 31/4-5. I imagine little tramar jumping and thumping on her shoulders and neck making her carry them as riders, a childish sport iþna gorrðom í (cf. the OE dweorh, thought to have caused illness by riding his victim as a horse—cwæð þæt þū his hængest wære; Storms 166, no. 7 (CT)).

30/6-7 kranga: hap. leg.; adj. krangr occurs once, of the new-born Brynhildr, hón kræng of komz / fyr kné móður, 'she was born sickly [or by breach birth?] between her mother's knees', Sigsk 45. Kranga as a verb of movement associates itself with ModE 'cringe' (OE cringan, 'fall to the ground'); cf. ModÍcel krangalegur, 'weak', krangur, 'long, narrow passage', krungur, 'humpback'. Implications are of abnormality, inhibited stature, crooked movement.

kostalaus . . . kostavpn: the pl. kostir covers all the choices and benefits of existence, including lands, marriage, food (including Gerðr's daily meal, which she is never given? See Reichardt 490; Fritzner s.v. kostr).

30/10 leiða með tárom trega: leiða has here probably some of its physical sense, 'to escort', 'to bear along' (following from kranga), but it can also be used metaphorically, as in HHv 41/7-8: iþfur ungan / ástom leiðir, '(that) you may lead the young prince with love', i.e. love him.

31/1-3 See Skm Introd 1. B ad loc.

nara, 'to lead a savourless life, without vitality'. Rare in ON; cf. the Orkney poem of proverbs c. 1200, Málsháttakvæði 25: sagt er frá, hvé neflauss narir, 'it is told how impoverished a life a noseless man lives'. See also Alexanders Saga 100: Þat er karlmannlegt at forðaz [dauðann]. en hataz eigi við livet. Úþrifnir menn oc eliuñlausir leggja leiðinde á at liva. Oc eigi er þat undarlect. þviat enom nennolausa þeim er narir i heiminom er sem dauðe. þat er livet scal heita, 'It is manly to avoid [death] and not to feel hatred for life. Underdeveloped men and those without physical strength take a loathing for living, and that is not surprising, for to the apathetic man who vegetates in the world, what should be called life is like death (. . . Ignaro vivere mors est, Alexandreis 417)'; cf. ModÍcel of a candle about to go out: þat narir á skari, 'it is guttering at the candle's end'. Skírnir's vocabulary is excellent.

31/5 morn morni: morna, 'to pine away, wither in unhappiness', is not uncommon (Fritzner s.v. cites þorna ok morna, þverra ok af angri deyja, 'grow dry and wither, waste away and die of grief', Barlaams ok Jósaphats Saga 163). The noun morn is hap. leg. (cf. AEW s.v.). For a remarkable portrait of a woman mentally weakened by the shock of her lover's death, see Bjarn 205-6: hon mornaði þll ok þorrnaði.

31/6-8 Ver — ofanverða: I follow the most obvious interpretation of these lines (as in UD (b), 256 and n. 3, where some older references are given). For later work see especially Harris and, for a splendid survey of the problem and its scholarship, Heizmann (b), 304. My choice of the simple solution is guided by the simplicity of the poet's scheme, built upon direct contrasts (e.g. þistill versus corn).

þrunginn might imply the bursting of the full-blown thistle, but as this is healthy fertility in the thistle ('the seeded pride . . . to this maturity blown up . . . must . . . shedding breed a nursery', Troilus and Cressida 1. iii. 310-13), it is unlikely that the poet would choose it as an image in this context; would he not prefer that of the useless weed churned into the ground by the threshers' feet after the flails had done their work and the grain had been gathered? (This is only an imagined reconstruction of an after-threshing scene.) For þrunginn (-it), 'pushed', 'crushed back', by an external force, see Hamð 4/1 and commentary.

32/2 til hrás viðar: in an OE charm a grēne gyrde, 'green rod, wand', is required to mark a magic circle round a sick man (Storms 299). In the OE Exodus 281 the rod of Moses is referred to as grēne tane, 'green twig' (MS. 'tacne', but translating Lat virga). From grēne, 'fresh, living', the implication 'potent, magical' would seem to have developed.

32/3 gambanteinn, 'magic rod, wand'. In Hárb 20 Óðinn recounts the joke that the giant Hlébarðr once gave him a gambanteinn, / en ek vélta hann ór viti, 'I bewitched him out of his wits'. This is just what Skírnir is threatening. Gamban- occurs only in two other compounds, gambanreiði, Skm 33/6, gambansumbl, Lks 8/6; in all three terms the sense 'mighty with supernatural power' would be generally fitting. The etymology of gamban- has not been determined; no doubt it relates to a concept of magnitude, which readily takes on associations of magic (see commentary to Vsp 3/7). The feast in Lks is intended to be a high, sanctified ceremony of gods, their drink the drink of immortality: Bragi might well, in his oratorical fashion, call it gambansumbl, 'the feast of divine power', from which the disgraced Loki should be excluded.

33/1-3 The poet may well be following traditional modes of cursing here, but we have few models to judge by. The cursing lausavísa 19 in Egil which has phrasing reminiscent of Skm 33—reið sé rogn ok Óðinn, 'may the divine powers and Óðinn be in anger'—is unlikely to be authentic.

Asabragr, i.e. Þórr; see the valuable assessment of de Vries, AR §§ 441.

34/3 Suttunga: Suttungr is the giant from whom Óðinn stole the mead Óðrerir (Háv 104-10); in Alv 34/6, Suttungs synir call pl 'sumbl'. We must suppose that Suttungr had a variant name Suttungi*, which gives gen. Suttunga, as Surtr had Surti* (cf. Surtalogi, Vafþ 51), or that Suttungar has become a giant tribe name, seen here in gen. pl. But it is not clear why he, or they, should be distinguished from the iptnar of 34/1.

34/8 nyt: for the sexual reference of nyt see Fritzner s.v. § 1, p. 844 a, lines 11-14; also s.v. njóta § 2.

35 Reichardt 493 would place 35 after 31 in order to keep the references to Gerðr's life among giants and pursar together (30, 31, 35). This has not met with universal approval. I should be sorry to lose the momentary glimpse of human festivity in manna glaum (34/7)—with its hint of good ale circulating—followed by the rotten drink of goats' urine in 35/6, or to lose the climax of the crushed thistle in 31/6-8, heightened by the complete change of tone in 32/1. Because of the poet's many clever juxtapositions, it seems best to leave this high-spirited curse to its present heady sequence.

35/1 Hrímgrímnir: Grímnir, 'Visored, Helmeted One', is an Óðinn-name quite often used as the second element of giant-names (? here 'Frost-Óðinn').

35/3 fyr nágrindr neðan: see commentary to Vsp 2/5-8. It would seem that 'below the corpse-pens' implies deep in the earth (i.e. lower than the dead are buried) and below that is Hel (Lks 63/5), with the world tree's nine roots, which hold all the subterranean realms together (Vafþ 43). To be lower than the buried dead would be an ugly threat in itself. LP understands nágrindr as Hel's gates, but fyr... neðan would be better suited to an area, below which could be another area or realm. So I take nágrindr as a fenced graveyard, underground, the symbolic repository of all the dead.

35/6 geita hland: There is surely an allusion here to the drink of the gods, goat's mead (Grím 25), just as there was a comparison with Heimdallr in 28/6. It is a jest that Skírnir permits himself.

35/9 at þínom munom: I would reject MS. af because af is never used with munr, while at is idiomatic, implying compliance with a person's pleasure or will. The contrast between at þínom munom / at mínom munom lies not only in the opposing þínom and mínom, but in the verbal play 'wishes', i.e. 'desires', munom, and 'wishes', i.e. 'will, determination', munom?; a further contrast is superfluous.

36/1-4 Purs: see Skm Introd I.B on stanza 31; also UD (b), 258-60. What Skírnir is carving is not wholly clear. It might be the word Purs, followed by three P-runes to which he attributes the implications of ergi, æði, and óþoli; or it might be the word Purs, or the rune standing for it, followed by three runes we have no other record of, named as Skírnir says. Or Skírnir might be following a conventional Purs in runes with invented characters to impress Gerðr (or the audience). For a spirited survey of the problems (including the dating of three possible initial runes for ergi, æði, óþoli) see Skm-Modell 90-1.

ergi: sometimes, incorrectly I think, translated 'perversion'. That would be a conventionally correct translation if ergi were used of a man; because ergi refers to feminine desire for a man, normal feminine lust driven to excess (the kind of suicidal love sent by Aphrodite which Greek girls prayed they might never experience). It is rarely used of women in ON (cf. Bærings Saga 110; Egils Saga einhenda 176), and then not without an element of bewitchment (see Skm Introd II.C).

æði ok óþola occur together also in the description of the torments of the lecherous in hell in Duggals leiðsla 50-1 (probably borrowed from Skm), where they are the pains that torture the genitals. One MS. replaces óþoli with óþolanligur bryne, 'unbearable burning', to make the specific sense clearer; Cahill 442. The Latin text is less vivid: Doloribus quoque verendorum locorum cruciabantur quam maximis.

37/2 hrímkálki, 'frost-chalice' (Lat calix, OE calic), perhaps borrowed through OE. I imagine that 'frost' might come to mind when Norsemen saw the Roman uncoloured glass, perhaps already touched with a little white weathering and iridescence, against which the strokes of engraving look very like frost (see many examples in Harden; D. Wilson 23; Steenstrup, facing 216).

37/6 vaningia: not elsewhere a term used of the Vanir. LP s.v. notes that vaningi is a heiti for göltr, '(gelded) boar', probably so called because it was the sacrificial beast of the Vanir. Is Gerðr deliberately using an ambiguous term to mock the family of her future husband?

38/5 þroska, 'well-thriven', 'mature', 'virile', 'grown-up'; the adj. only here, but related forms, þroski, 'maturity', 'proven quality', þroskask, 'to grow ripe', 'to develop fully and well', are common. For alliteration on the second stress in the b-line cf. 6/2 (one might also read enom þroska munt; see, however, Vkv Introd IV.E).

38/6 nenna, 'to show interest, pleasure, in', 'to consent'.

39/1 Barri: probably a name made up for the occasion, to combine the fertile associations of barr, 'pine-needle', and barr, 'barley', much as Hallfreðr plays on both senses when he describes Norway as the barrhaddaða biðkván Priðja, 'Óðinn's waiting wife, whose tresses are pine-needles and barley'. The image captures the pine forests of Norway and the Norwegian girl's braided blond hair (Davidson 497–503, Hák 6; see Skm Introd II. A).

39/3 lundr lognfara: a grove connotes sacredness and exclusion of unholy elements (cf. the castum nemus of Nerthus, Germ xl; AR § 250). With her choice of lundr and her imposition of nine nights of waiting Gerðr would seem to be insisting on a certain dignity and decorum in her union with Freyr. There is no reason to assume that their union is not marriage, or a preliminary to marriage (in the Hák Hákon (Óðinn's counterpart) has sexual union with the land of Norway before formally 'wedding' her (see Skm Introd II. A)). We have no record of the nature of pagan Norse marriage laws, but some of the early Roman laws require only a statement of mutual consent. By his term hýnótt (42) Freyr, I would suggest, recognizes his marital obligations as a conventional, legal, bridegroom. He was, after all, the special patron of marriages (Adam of Bremen IV. xxvii).

lognfara is technically a puzzle (possibly a piece of poet's wit). If we take -fara as gen. sg. of -fari, 'one who goes, travels', and the formation of the compound as similar to that of dynfari, gnyfari, 'one who travels with noise, uproar', namely 'wind' (Alv 20/5, variant readings), then lognfari will be 'one who travels with logn', and lundr lognfara will be a 'grove of visiting, invading stillness' (the opposite of a grove of loud wind). The puzzle lies in presenting as a figure of movement, -fari, what is always perceived as motionless, logn.

40/6 eða may be 'and' or 'or' (or both, poetically; see commentary to Vsp 23/1–8).

42 There is a numerical puzzle that the poet has set us here. Gerðr has imposed nine nights of waiting upon Freyr. He wonders how he can endure three nights (not nine). The usual period of marital chastity after the formal wedding is three nights (see Ríg Introd n. 44). Gerðr has tripled this number. Freyr, therefore, has to wait three (solar) nights in order to 'earn' only one nuptial night, one hýnótt. He is complaining, 'How can I endure an abstention of priár hýnætr in which each hýnótt is reckoned as priár nætr? I am only halfway through the first hýnótt—of priár nætr—and it has seemed more than a month to me!'

42/3 preyia: cf. Vkv 3/3–4. Snorri has modernized the more succinct, more desperate poetic phrasing (see the textual variants).

42/6 hýnótt: hap. leg. I take hý- to be related to hjón, 'wedded couple', hjú, 'wedded couple', 'household', hýbýli, 'homestead', hýróg, 'quarrelling in the family' (Háv 137/11). The context of reference to 'three nights', and the situation itself, determines the sense of hýnótt as 'night of nuptial chastity'.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Manuscripts, with Facsimile Editions

- A AM 748 I 4^o. Fragments of the Elder and Younger Edda. AM 748 I and II 4^o, ed. E. Wessén. Corpus Codicum Islandicorum, 17. Copenhagen, 1945. Leaves 1–6, containing the Eddic poems, ed. with transcription by Finnur Jónsson, Håndskriftet nr. 748 4^o, bl 1–6 i den Arna-magnæanske Samling. STUAGNL, 25. Copenhagen, 1895.
- B AM 757a 4^o. Ed. in Edda Snorra Sturlusonar, Copenhagen, 1848–87, II. 501–72.
- H Hauksbók: AM 371 4^o, AM 544 4^o, AM 675 4^o. AM 544 4^o contains Vþluspá. Hauksbók, ed. Finnur Jónsson (diplomatic text). Det Kongelige Nordiske Oldskrift-Selskab. Copenhagen, 1892–6. The H version of Vþluspá is also edited (diplomatic text) in Bugge (a).
- R Codex Regius of the Poetic Edda, GkS 2365 4^o. Håndskriftet nr. 2365 4^o gl. kgl. Samling (Codex Regius af den ældre Edda): I fototypisk og diplomatisk Gengivelse, ed. for STUAGNL by L. F. A. Wimmer and Finnur Jónsson. Copenhagen, 1891 (referred to as FJ Facs in the present edition). Also Codex Regius of the Elder Edda, ed. A. Heusler. Corpus Codicum Islandicorum, 10. Copenhagen, 1937.
- SR Codex Regius of the Snorra Edda, GkS 2367 4^o. Codex Regius of the Younger Edda, ed. E. Wessén. Corpus Codicum Islandicorum, 14. Copenhagen, 1940.
- T Codex Trajectinus. 1374, University Library, Utrecht. Codex Trajectinus. The Utrecht Manuscript of the Prose Edda, ed. A. Faulkes. Early Icelandic Manuscripts in Facsimile, 15. Copenhagen, 1985.
- U Codex Upsaliensis. De la Gardie 11, University Library, Uppsala. Snorre Sturlasons Edda. Uppsala-handskriften DG 11, ed. A. Grape. Stockholm, 1962.
- W Codex Wormianus: AM 242 fol. Codex Wormianus (The Younger Edda), ed. Sigurður Nordal. Corpus Codicum Islandicorum, 2. Copenhagen, 1931.

Other Works

- Aasen, I., Norsk Ordbog. Christiania, 1873.
- Abingdon Chronicle—Chronicon Monasterii de Abingdon, ed. J. Stevenson. 2 vols. Rolls Series. London, 1858.
- Acta Sanctorum*, ed. J. Bollandus et al. 1643–. January–November; Propylaeum Decembris, 1940.
- Acts of Peter* in J. K. Elliott, The Apocryphal New Testament: A Collection of Apocryphal Christian Literature in an English Translation. Oxford, 1993.
- Adam of Bremen, Magistri Adam Bremensis Gesta Hammaburgensis Ecclesiae Pontificum. Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum in Usus Scholarum ex Monumentis Germaniae Historicis Separatim Editi, ed. B. Schmeidler, 3rd edn. Hanover and Leipzig, 1917.

- Elfric, Lives of Saints, ed. W. W. Skeat. EETS OS 76, 82, 94, 114. Oxford, 1881-1900.
- Aeschylus, The Eumenides, in Oresteia, trans. R. Lattimore. Chicago, 1964.
- AEW—J. de Vries, Altnordisches etymologisches Wörterbuch, 3rd edn. Leiden, 1977.
- Agathias Scholastikos [c.530-80], Περὶ τῆς Ἰουστινιανοῦ βασιλείας, in Agathiae Myrinaei Historiarum Libri Quinque, ed. R. Keydell. Corpus Fontium Historiae Byzantinae, Series Berolinensis, 2. Berlin, 1967. Trans. The Histories, by J. D. Frendo, in Corpus Fontium Historiae Byzantinae, 2A. Berlin, 1975.
- Aggesen, Sven in SMHD 1.
- Agrip in IF 29.
- Aislinge Óenguso—The Dream of Óengus: An Old Irish Text Critically Restored and Edited with Notes and Glossary, by F. Shaw. Dublin, 1934.
- Akv—Atlakviða in PE 1.
- AL¹, AL²—J. de Vries, Altnordische Literaturgeschichte. 2 vols. Berlin. 1st edn. 1940-1, 2nd edn. 1964-7.
- Alexander, P. J., The Oracle of Baalbek: The Tiburtine Sibyl in Greek Dress. Dumbarton Oaks Studies, 10. 1967.
- Alexanders Saga: Norsk Bearbejdelse fra trettende Aarhundrede av Philip Gautiers latinske Digte Alexandreis, ed. C. R. Unger. Christiania, 1848.
- Alexandreis by Galterus de Castellione, ed. M. Colker. Thesaurus Mundi. Bibliotheca Scriptorum Latinorum Mediae et Recentioris Aetatis, 17. Padua, 1978.
- Alexiou, M., The Ritual Lament in Greek Tradition. Cambridge, 1974.
- Alfred, Boethius—King Alfred's Old English Version of Boethius De Consolatione Philosophiae, ed. W. J. Sedgefield. Oxford, 1899.
- The Metres of Boethius, in ASPR v.
- Allard, G.-H., 'Medietas' chez Jean Scot', in Begriff und Metapher. Sprachform des Denkens bei Eriugena, ed. W. Beierwaltes. Heidelberg, 1990, 95-107.
- Almqvist, B. (a), Norrön middiktning: Traditionshistoriska studier i versmagi 1: Nid mot furstar, 11: Nid mot missionärer; Senmedeltida nidtraditioner. Nordiska tekster och undersökningar, 21 and 23. Stockholm, 1965, 1974.
- (b), 'Scandinavian and Celtic Folklore Contacts in the Earldom of Orkney', SBVS 20 (1978-81), 80-105.
- Akv—Alvísmál in JH 11 and Kuhn-Neckel.
- Am—Atlamál in PE 1.
- AM Katalog—Katalog over den Arnemagnæanske Håndskriftsamling. 2 vols. Copenhagen, 1889, 1894.
- Andreas, ed. G. P. Krapp. Boston, 1906; also in ASPR 11.
- ANF—Arkiv för nordisk filologi.
- AR—J. de Vries, Altgermanische Religionsgeschichte, 2nd edn. 2 vols. Berlin, 1956-7.
- Arinbjarnarkviða by Egill Skalla-Grimsson (c. 962), in Egil 258-67; also in Skjald B 1. 38-41.
- Aristotle, The Physics, ed. and trans. P. H. Wicksteed and F. M. Cornford. 2 vols. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1929-34.
- Arrhenius, B., Granatschmuck und Gemmen aus nordischen Funden des frühen Mittelalters. Acta Universitatis Stockholmiensis. Studies in north-European archaeology. Series B 3. Stockholm, 1971.

- ASC—Anglo-Saxon Chronicle in Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel, ed. J. Earle and C. Plummer. 2 vols. Oxford, 1892-9.
- ASPR—The Anglo-Saxon Poetic Records, ed. G. P. Krapp and E. van Kirk Dobbie. 6 vols. New York, 1931-53.
- Augustine, St, The City of God against the Pagans, ed. and trans. G. C. McCracken, P. Levine, W. Green, and D. Wiesen. 7 vols. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1957-72.
- Austrfararvísir by Sigvatr Þórðarson (c. 1019), in Hkr 11. 135-45; also in Skjald B 1. 220-5.
- AW—E. Karg-Gasterstadt and T. Frings, Althochdeutsches Wörterbuch, ed. R. Grosse. Berlin, 1968-.
- Bächtold-Stäubli, H., Handwörterbuch des deutschen Aberglaubens. 10 vols. Berlin, 1927-42.
- Bærings Saga in Fornsögur Suðurlanda, ed. G. Cederschiöld and H. Gering. Lund, 1884.
- Baetke, W. (a), Das Heilige im Germanischen. Tübingen, 1942.
- (b), Yngvi und die Ynglingar: Eine quellenkritische Untersuchung über das nordische 'Sakralkönigtum'. Sitzungsberichte der sächsischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Leipzig, phil.-hist. Kl., 109: 3. Berlin, 1964.
- Barlaams ok Jósaphats Saga, ed. R. Keyser and C. R. Unger. Christiania, 1851.
- Bartrum, P. C. (ed.), Welsh Genealogies AD 300-1400. 8 vols. Cardiff, 1974.
- BAWA—Die Bayerische Akademie der Wissenschaften. Abhandlungen. Philosophisch-philologische und historische Klasse. Munich.
- BDR—Balders Draumar.
- Beck, H., Einige vendelzeitliche Bildenkmäler und die literarische Überlieferung. BAWA 99, 1964.
- Bede, Historia Ecclesiastica in Venerabilis Bedae Opera Historica, ed. C. Plummer. 2 vols. Oxford, 1896.
- Behre, F., The Subjunctive in Old English Poetry. Göteborg, 1934.
- Belgskakadrápa by Þórðr Kolbeinsson (1007), in Skjald B 1. 202-3.
- Bell, A. (ed.), Le Lai d'Haveloc and Gaimar's Haveloc Episode. Manchester, 1925.
- Bendinelli, G., 'Il mausoleo sotterraneo altrimenti detto Basilica di Porta Maggiore', Bullettino della Commissione Archeologica Comunale di Roma (Rome, 1922), 85-126.
- Benediktsson, Hreinn (ed.), The First Grammatical Treatise. University of Iceland Publications in Linguistics, 1. Reykjavík, 1972.
- Beowulf and the Fight at Finnsburg, ed. F. Klaeber, 3rd edn. Boston, 1950.
- Berschin, W., Biographie und Epochenstil im lateinischen Mittelalter 11. Stuttgart, 1988.
- Best, R. I. (ed.), 'The Settling of the Manor of Tara', Ériu: The Journal of the School of Irish Learning, Dublin 4 (1910), 121-72.
- Bhattacharji, S., The Indian Theogony: A Comparative Study of Indian Mythology from the Vedas to the Purāṇas. Cambridge, 1970.
- Bibire, P., 'Freyr and Gerðr: The Story and its Myths', in Sagnaskemmtun. Studies in Honour of Hermann Pálsson, ed. R. Simek, Jónas Kristjánsson, and H. Bekker-Nielsen. Vienna, 1986, 19-40.
- Biddle, M. (a), 'A Late Saxon Frieze Sculpture from the Old Minster', appendix

- (329–32) to 'Excavations at Winchester 1965: Fourth Interim Report', The Antiquaries Journal 46 (1966), 308–32.
- (ed.) (b), Object and Economy in Medieval Winchester, Artefacts from Medieval Winchester. Winchester Studies, 7 ii. Oxford, 1990.
- Binchy, D. A., Celtic and Anglo-Saxon Kingship. O'Donnell Lecture. Oxford, 1970.
- Bion, Lament for Adonis—Bion (?), Chant funèbre en l'honneur d'Adonis in Bucoliques Grecs II. Pseudo-Théocrite. Moschos. Bion. Divers, ed. P. E. Legrand. Collection des Universités de France. Budé. Paris, 1953. Also in The Greek Bucolic Poets, ed. and trans. J. M. Edmonds. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1928, 387–95.
- Bischoff, B., 'Die lateinischen Übersetzungen und Bearbeitungen aus den Oracula Sibyllina', in Mittelalterliche Studien: Ausgewählte Aufsätze zur Schriftkunde und Literaturgeschichte 1. Stuttgart, 1966, 150–71. Reprinted from Mélanges Joseph de Ghellinck, S. J. Gembloux, 1951.
- Bisk—Biskupa Sögur*, ed. Guðbrandur Vigfússon and Jón Sigurðsson. 2 vols. Copenhagen, 1858–78.
- Bjarkamál in fornu* in Skjald B1. 170–1.
- Bjarn—Bjarnar Saga hítðælakappa* in ÍF 3.
- Björkman, E., Scandinavian Loan-Words in Middle English. Halle, 1900.
- Blackall, S. E., 'A Stylistic Study of the Sagas of Sturla Þórðarson and their Relationship to some other Thirteenth Century Icelandic Historical and Literary Sagas (Sverris Saga, Heimskringla, Knýtlinga Saga, Hákonar Saga Hákonarsonar, Njáls Saga, Íslendinga Saga Sturlu Þórðarsonar)'. D.Phil. thesis. Oxford, 1981.
- Blathmac, The Poems of Blathmac son of Cú Brettan, ed. J. Carney. Irish Texts Society, 47. Dublin, 1964.
- Blindheim, C., 'Vernesfunnene og kvinnedrakten i Norden i vikingtiden', Viking: Tidsskrift for norrøn arkeologi 9 (1945), 143–62.
- Blöndal, Sigfús, Íslandsk-dansk Ordbog. 2 vols. Reykjavík, 1920–4.
- Blondheim, D. S., Les Parlers judéo-romans et la Vetus Latina, Étude sur les rapports entre les traductions bibliques en langue romane des juifs au moyen âge et les anciennes versions. Paris, 1925.
- Böðvarsson, Árni, Íslenzk orðabók. Reykjavík, 1963.
- Boethius, The Theological Tractates, The Consolation of Philosophy, ed. and trans. H. F. Stewart, E. K. Rand, and S. J. Tester. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1978.
- Boniface, Briefe des Bonifatius, ed. W. Levison, R. Rau, and M. Tangl. Ausgewählte Quellen zur deutschen Geschichte des Mittelalters, 4b. Darmstadt, 1968.
- The Book of the Dead*, trans. E. A. W. Budge, 2nd edn. London, 1928.
- Boor, H. de, 'Die religiöse Sprache der Völuspá und verwandter Denkmäler', in Kleine Schriften 1: Mittelhochdeutsche Literatur. Berlin, 1964, 209–83. Repr. from Deutsche Islandsforschung 1 (Breslau, 1930), 68–142, ed. W. H. Vogt.
- Bostock, J. K., A Handbook on Old High German Literature. Oxford, 1955.
- Braune, W., Althochdeutsches Lesebuch, 11th edn. ed. K. Helm. Halle, 1949.
- Brehm, A., Djurens liv, trans. from German. Malmö, 1929.
- Brehon Law Tracts in Ancient Laws and Institutes of Ireland* IV: Din Teitugad and Certain Other Brehon Law Tracts, ed. A. G. Richey. Dublin and London, 1879.
- Brot af Sigurðarkviðu* in Kuhn–Neckel.

- Brown, U., 'The Saga of Hrómund Gripsson and Dorgilssaga', SBVS 13 (1947–8), 51–77. Repr. in U. Dronke (I) XV.
- Brown, W. N., 'The Rigvedic Equivalent for Hell', Journal of the American Oriental Society 61 (1941), 74–80.
- Bruder, R., Die germanische Frau im Lichte der Runeninschriften und der antiken Historiographie. Quellen und Forschungen zur Sprach- und Kulturgeschichte der germanischen Völker, NS 57. Berlin, 1974.
- BT—J. Bosworth and T. N. Toller, An Anglo-Saxon Dictionary. Oxford, 1898. Supplement by Toller, 1921. Addenda and Corrigenda to the Supplement by A. Campbell, 1972.
- Bugge, S. (a), Norræn Fornkvæði. Christiania, 1867.
- (b), 'Det oldnorske Kvad om Völund (Völundarkviða) og dets Forhold til engelske Sagn', ANF 26 (1909–10), 33–77.
- Bulst, W., 'Eine anglo-lateinische Übersetzung aus dem Griechischen um 700', ZFDA 75 (1938), 105–14.
- Burnett, C. S. F., 'Scandinavian Runes in a Latin Magical Treatise', Speculum 58 (1983), 419–29.
- Bysk—Byskupa Sögur*, ed. Jón Helgason. Copenhagen, 1938 (I: Hungrvaka), 1978 (II: Þorláks Saga, (áls Saga, Jartegnabækur).
- Cahill, P., 'Three Notes on Duggals Leizla', SBVS 19 (1974–7), 442–6.
- Cambridge Psalter*, ed. K. Wildhagen. Bibliothek der angelsächsischen Prosa in kritisch bearbeiteten Texten (ed. C. W. M. Grein, R. P. Wülker), 7. Hamburg, 1910.
- Campbell, A. (a), Old English Grammar. Oxford, 1959.
- (b), 'The Old English Epic Style', in Tolkien Studies 13–26.
- Carcopino, J., La Basilique pythagoricienne de la Porte majeure. Paris, 1943.
- Carey, J., 'The Sun's Night Journey: A Pharaonic Image in Medieval Ireland', Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 57 (1994), 14–34.
- Carozzi—Adalbéron de Laon, Carmen ad Rotbertum Regem, ed. and trans. C. Carozzi. Paris, 1979.
- Cato, De Agri Cultura, in Cato and Varro, On Agriculture, ed. and trans. W. D. Hooper and H. B. Ash. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1934.
- Disticha Catonis, in Minor Latin Poets II, ed. and trans. J. W. Duff and A. M. Duff. Loeb Classical Library. Rev. edn. London, 1982.
- Chadwick, N., 'Pictish and Celtic Marriage in Early Literary Tradition', Scottish Gaelic Studies 8 (1955), 56–115.
- Charles-Edwards, T., 'Críth Gablach and the Law of Status', Peritia, Journal of the Medieval Academy of Ireland 3 (Galway, 1986), 53–73.
- CHMPT—The Cambridge History of Medieval Political Thought c.350–c.1450, ed. J. H. Burns. Cambridge, 1988.
- Christ* in ASPR III.
- Christ and Satan* in ASPR I.
- Christensen, R., Folktales of Norway. London, 1964.
- Chronicon Lethrense* in SMHD 1.

- Clement of Alexandria, The Exhortation to the Greeks, The Rich Man's Salvation, and the Fragment of an Address Entitled To the Newly Baptized, ed. and trans. G. W. Butterworth. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1919.
- Clemons, P., Interactions of Thought and Language in Old English Poetry. Cambridge Studies in Anglo-Saxon England, 12. Cambridge, 1995.
- Cline, W. B., Mining and Metallurgy in Negro Africa. General Series in Anthropology, 5. Wisconsin, 1937.
- Clunies Ross, M., 'Why Skaði Laughed: Comic Seriousness in an Old Norse Mythic Narrative', Maal og Minne 1989, 1–14.
- Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici*, ed. J. Kemble. 6 vols. London, 1839–48.
- Cogadh Gaedhel re Gallaibh: The War of the Gaedhil with the Gaill*. Rerum Britannicarum Medii Aevi Scriptores, ed. and trans. J. H. Todd. London, 1867.
- Collins, J. J. (a), 'Sibylline Oracles (Second Century BC–Seventh Century AD)', in The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha 1: Apocalyptic Literature and Testaments, ed. J. H. Charlesworth. London, 1983, 317–472.
- (b), 'The Development of the Sibylline Tradition', in Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt, pt. 2, vol. 20 i, ed. W. Haase. Berlin, 1987, 421–59.
- Constable, G.—Apologiae Duae . . . Burchardi, ut Videtur, Abbatis Bellevallis Apologia de Barbis, ed. R. B. C. Huygens. With an introduction on beards in the Middle Ages by G. Constable. Corpus Christianorum. Continuatio Medievals, 62. Turnhout, 1985.
- Coomaraswamy, A. K. (a), 'The Sun-Kiss', Journal of the American Oriental Society 60 (1940), 46–67.
- (b), 'Sir Gawain and the Green Knight: Indra and Namuci', Speculum 19 (1944), 104–25.
- Cornford, F. M., Plato's Cosmology. London, 1937.
- The Courtship of Etain in Heroic Romances of Ireland 1*, trans. A. H. Leahy. London, 1905–6.
- CPB—Corpus Poeticum Boreale, ed. and trans. Guðbrandur Vigfússon, F. York Powell. 2 vols. Oxford, 1883.
- Críth Gablach*, ed. D. A. Binchy. Medieval and Modern Irish Series, 11. Dublin, 1941.
- Crozier, A., 'Ørlygis draugr and ørløg drygja', ANF 101 (1986), 127–48.
- Czaplicka, M. A., Aboriginal Siberia. Oxford, 1914.
- Daniel* in ASPR 1.
- Davey, A., 'An Edition of the Shorter Gautreks Saga with Introduction, Commentary, and Translation'. M.Litt. thesis. Oxford, 1985.
- Davidson, D. L., 'Earl Hákon and his Poets'. D.Phil. thesis. Oxford, 1983.
- Deor* in ASPR III.
- Detter, F., 'Hárr', PBB 18 (1894), 202–3.
- DgF—Danmarks gamle Folkeviser, ed. S. Grundtvig, A. Olrik, and H. Grüner Nielsen. 12 vols. Copenhagen, 1853–1976.
- DH—F. Detter and R. Heinzel, Sæmundar Edda II: Anmerkungen. Leipzig, 1903. [My reference to DH relates to the line of the text under discussion.]
- Dickins, B. (ed. and trans.), Runic and Heroic Poems of the Old Teutonic Peoples. Cambridge, 1915.

- Diels, H., Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker Griechisch und Deutsch, 6th edn. rev. W. Kranz. 2 vols. Berlin, 1951–3.
- Dio Cassius, Roman History, ed. and trans. E. Cary. 9 vols. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1914–27.
- DN—Diplomatarium Norvegicum: Oldbreve til Kundskab om Norges indre og ydre Forhold, Sprog, Slægter, Lovgivning og Rettergang i Middelalderen, ed. C. A. Lange and C. R. Unger. Christiania, 1849–.
- Dodds, E. R., The Greeks and the Irrational. Berkeley, 1951.
- Doht, R., Der Rauschtrank im germanischen Mythos. Wiener Arbeiten zur germanischen Altertumskunde und Philologie, 3. Vienna, 1974.
- Dölger, F. R., Sol Salutis: Gebet und Gesang im christlichen Altertum. Liturgiegeschichtliche Forschungen, 4–5. 2nd edn. Münster in Westfalen, 1925.
- Dream of Óengus*—see Aislinge Óengus.
- Dream of Rhonabwy in the Mabinogion*.
- Dream of the Rood*, ed. B. Dickens and A. S. C. Ross, 3rd edn. London, 1951.
- Dronke, P. (a), 'The Return of Eurydice', Classica et Mediaevalia 23 (1962), 198–215.
- (b), 'L'amor che move il sole e l'altre stelle', Studi Medievali 3ª Serie VI (1965), 389–422. Repr. in P. Dronke, The Medieval Poet and his World. Storia e Letteratura, 164. Rome, 1984, 439–75.
- (c), Poetic Individuality in the Middle Ages: New Departures in Poetry 1000–1150. Oxford, 1970. 2nd edn.: Westfield Publications in Medieval Studies, 1. London, 1986.
- (d), 'Waltharius–Gaiferos', in Barbara et Antiquissima Carmina. Universidad Autónoma de Barcelona, 1977, 29–79. Repr. in P. Dronke (g) I.
- (e), 'Towards the Interpretation of the Leiden Love-Spell', Cambridge Medieval Celtic Studies 16 (Cambridge, 1988), 61–75. Repr. in P. Dronke (g) V.
- (f), Hermes and the Sibyls: Continuations and Creations. Inaugural Lecture delivered 9 March 1990. Cambridge, 1990. Repr. in P. Dronke, Intellectuals and Poets in Medieval Europe. Storia e Letteratura, 183. Rome, 1992, 219–44.
- (g), Latin and Vernacular Poets of the Middle Ages. Variorum Collected Studies Series. Aldershot, 1991.
- (ed. and trans.) (h), Nine Medieval Latin Plays. Cambridge Medieval Classics, 1. Cambridge, 1994.
- (i), Verses with Prose: From Petronius to Dante: The Art and Scope of the Mixed Form. Cambridge, Mass., 1994.
- Dronke, U. (a), 'Reginsmál v. 8', Maal og Minne 1960, 97–8.
- (b), 'Art and Tradition in Skírnismál', in Tolkien Studies 250–68. Repr. in Dronke (l) IX.
- (c), 'Völuspá and Satiric Tradition', Aion-n 22 (Naples, 1979), 57–86. Studi per Mario Gabrieli. Repr. in U. Dronke (l) VI.
- (d), The Role of Sexual Themes in Njáls Saga. Dorothea Coke Memorial Lecture in Northern Studies, 1980. London, 1981. Repr. in U. Dronke (l) XVI.
- (e), 'Sem jarlar forðum. The Influence of Rígsþula on Two Saga Episodes', in Speculum Norroenum 56–72. Repr. in U. Dronke (l) X.
- (f), 'The War of the Æsir and Vanir in Völuspá', in Idee. Gestalt. Geschichte.

- Festschrift Klaus von See*, ed. G. W. Weber. Odense, 1988, 223–38. Repr. in U. Dronke (I) VII.
- Dronke, U. (g), 'Marx, Engels and Norse Mythology', in Studies in Honour of H. L. Rogers. Leeds Studies in English, NS 20. Leeds, 1989, 29–45.
- (h), 'The Scope of the Corpus Poeticum Boreale', in Úr Dólum til Dala: Guðbrandur Vigfússon Centenary Essays, ed. R. McTurk and A. Wawn. Leeds Texts and Monographs, NS 11. Leeds Studies in English. Leeds, 1989, 93–111. Repr. in U. Dronke (I) V.
- (i), 'Eddic Poetry as a Source for the History of Germanic Religion', in Germanische Religionsgeschichte: Quellen und Quellenprobleme, ed. H. Beck, D. Ellmers, and K. Schier. Berlin and New York, 1992, 656–84. Repr. in U. Dronke (I) IV.
- (j), 'Völuspá and Sibylline Traditions', in GL 3–23. Repr. in U. Dronke (I) II.
- (k), 'Pagan Beliefs and Christian Impact: The Contribution of Eddic Studies', in Viking Revaluations. Viking Society Centenary Symposium, ed. A. Faulkes and R. Perkins. London, 1993. Repr. in U. Dronke (I) XII.
- (l), Myth and Fiction in Early Norse Lands. Variorum Collected Studies Series. Aldershot, 1996.
- Dronke, U., and P. Dronke, 'The Prologue of the Prose Edda: Explorations of a Latin Background', in Sjötú ritgerðir 1. 153–76. Repr. in U. Dronke (I) III.
- Duby, G., Les Trois Ordres ou l'imaginaire du féodalisme. Paris, 1978.
- Duggals Leifsla, ed. and trans. P. Cahill. Stofnun Árna Magnússonar á Íslandi, Rit 25. Reykjavík, 1983.
- Dumézil, G. (a), Le Festin d'immortalité: Étude de mythologie comparée indo-européenne. Annales du Musée Guimet, Bibliothèque d'Études, 34. Paris, 1924.
- (b), '"Tripertita" fonctionnels chez divers peuples indo-européens', Revue de l'histoire des religions 131 (1946), 53–72.
- (c), Les Dieux des indo-européens. Paris, 1952.
- (d), 'Two Minor Scandinavian Gods: Byggvir and Beyla', in Dumézil (h), 89–117. Trans. from 'Deux petits dieux scandinaves: Byggvir et Beyla', La Nouvelle Clio 3 (1952), 1–31.
- (e), Rituels indo-européens à Rome. Paris, 1954.
- (f), 'La Rígsþula et la structure sociale indo-européenne', Revue de l'histoire des religions 154 (1958), 1–9.
- (g), Les Dieux des Germains: Essai sur la formation de la religion scandinave. Paris, 1959. Trans. with revisions as Dumézil (h).
- (h), Gods of the Ancient Northmen. Publications of the UCLA Center for the Study of Comparative Folklore and Mythology, 3. Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1973.
- Dumont, P.-E., 'The Horse-Sacrifice in the Taittirīya-Brāhmaṇa', Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society 92 (1948), 447–99.
- Dumville, D. N. (a), 'Liturgical Drama and Panegyric Responsory from the Eighth Century? A Re-examination of the Origin and Contents of the Ninth-Century Section of the Book of Cerne', Journal of Theological Studies, NS 23 (1972), 374–406.
- (b), 'Biblical Apocrypha and the Early Irish: A Preliminary Investigation', Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy section C, 73, No. 8 (1973), 299–338.
- DW—H. Paul, Deutsches Wörterbuch, rev. W. Betz, 5th edn. Tübingen, 1966.

- EDD—J. Wright, The English Dialect Dictionary. 6 vols. Oxford, 1898–1905.
- EddMin—Eddica Minora. Dichtung eddischer Art aus den Fornaldarsögur und anderen Prosawerken, ed. A. Heusler and W. Ranisch. Dortmund, 1903.
- Edwards, D. C., 'The Poetry of Arnórr Jarlaskáld: An Edition and Study'. D.Phil. thesis. Oxford, 1979. To be published (D. C. Whaley) as Westfield Publications in Medieval Studies 8. London, 1997.
- EETS—Early English Text Society. os—Ordinary Series. ss—Supplementary Series.
- Egil 1856—Sagan af Agli Skallagrímssyni, ed. J. Porkelsson. Reykjavík, 1856.
- Egil—Egils Saga Skalla-Grimssonar in ÍF 2.
- Egils Saga einhenda in Fas III.
- Eiðsvabingslov in NGL 1.
- Einarsson, Stefán, 'Eddu-smælki', Skírnir 122 (1948), 142–5.
- Eiríks Saga rauða in ÍF 4.
- Eiríksdrápa by Þórðr Kolbeinsson (1014), in Skjald B I. 203–6.
- Eiríksmál (anonymous), in Fagskinna ch. viii; also in Skjald A I. 174–5, B I. 164–6.
- Eldjárn, Kristján, Kuml og haugfé: Úr heiðnum sið á Íslandi. Akureyri, 1956.
- Elene in ASPR II.
- Eliade, M. (a), Le Chamanisme et les techniques archaïques de l'extase. Paris, 1951. Trans. as Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy by W. Trask. Princeton, 1972.
- (b), Forgerons et alchimistes. Paris, 1956. Trans. as The Forge and the Crucible by S. Corrin. London, 1962.
- Ellis Davidson, H. R. (a), The Sword in Anglo-Saxon England: Its Archaeology and Literature. Oxford, 1962.
- (b), 'The Smith and the Goddess: Two Figures on the Franks Casket from Auzon', FS 3 (1969), 216–26.
- Elmevik, L., 'Två eddaställen och en västnordisk ordgrupp', Scripta Islandica 25 (1974), 46–59.
- Elton, C., The Origins of English History, 2nd edn. London, 1890.
- Elucidarius in Hauksbók.
- English Medieval Lapidaries, ed. J. Evans and M. S. Serjeantson. EETS os 190. Oxford, 1933.
- English Romanesque Art 1066–1200, The Hayward Gallery, ed. G. Zarnecki, J. Holt, and T. Holland. London, 1984.
- Entre Asie et Europe. L'Or des Sarmates, nomades des steppes dans l'Antiquité. Abbaye de Daoulas, Finistère, 1995.
- Enūma eliš in Pritchard 60–72.
- Erfdrápa Óláfs helga by Sigvatr Þórðarson (1040), in Skjald B I. 239–45.
- Eriugena—Iohannis Scotti Erivgenae Carmina, ed. M. W. Herren. Scriptores Latini Hiberniae, 12. Dublin, 1993.
- Eugippius, Vita Sancti Severini, in MGH AA I, ed. H. Sapppe. Berlin, 1877.
- Eutropius, Breviarium Ab Vrbe Condita, in MGH AA II, ed. H. Droysen. Berlin, 1878.
- Exodus—The Old English Exodus, ed. and trans. J. R. R. Tolkien, prepared by J. Turville-Petre. Oxford, 1981; also in ASPR I.
- Eyrb—Eyrbyggja Saga in ÍF 4.

- Fáf—Fáfnismál* in JH III and Kuhn–Neckel.
Fagrsk—Fagrskinna in ÍF 29.
 Falk, H. S., Altwestnordische Kleiderkunde, mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Terminologie. Skrifter utgitt av Videnskapsselskapet i Kristiania, Hist.-Fil. Klasse, 3. 1919.
 Faral, E., La Légende arthurienne: Études et documents pt. I: Les Plus Anciens Textes vol. 1: Des origines à Geoffroy de Monmouth. Bibliothèque de l'École des Hautes Études, 255. Paris, 1929.
Fas—Fornaldarsögur Norðurlanda, ed. Guðni Jónsson and Bjarni Vilhjálmsson. 3 vols. Reykjavík, 1943–4.
 Faulkes, A. (a), 'Edda', Gripla 2 (1977), 32–9.
 — (ed.) (b), Snorri Sturluson, Edda. Prologue and Gylfaginning. Oxford, 1982.
 Feist, S., Vergleichendes Wörterbuch der gotischen Sprache, 3rd edn. Leiden, 1939.
Finnesburh in Finn and Hengest: The Fragment and the Episode, ed. J. R. R. Tolkien, prepared by A. Bliss. London, 1982; also in ASPR vi.
First Grammatical Treatise: The Earliest Germanic Phonology, ed. and trans. E. Haugen, 2nd edn. London, 1972.
 FJ—Finnur Jónsson.
 FJ (a)—Den oldnorske og oldislandske Litteraturs Historie, 2nd edn. 2 vols. Copenhagen, 1920–4.
 — (b)—Sæmundar-Edda. Eddukvæði, ed. Finnur Jónsson, 2nd edn. Reykjavík, 1926.
 FJ Facs—see R in Manuscripts at the beginning of the Bibliography.
Fjölsvinnsmál in Svipdagsmál.
Flat—Flateyjarbók, ed. C. R. Unger and Guðbrandur Vigfússon. 3 vols. Christiania, 1860–8.
 Fleck, J., 'Konr—Óttarr—Geirroðr: A Knowledge Criterion for Succession to the Germanic Sacred Kingship', Scandinavian Studies 42 (1970), 39–49.
 Flower, R., The Irish Tradition. Oxford, 1947.
 Foote, P., Aurvandilstá: Norse Studies. Viking Collection, 2. Odense, 1984.
 Forbes, R. J., Metallurgy in Antiquity. Leiden, 1950.
Forspjallsljóð in Bugge (a).
 Förstemann, E., Alteutsches Namenbuch I: Personennamen, II: Orts- und sonstige geographische Namen, 3rd edn. Bonn, 1913–16. Also H. Kaufmann, Ergänzungsband zu Ernst Förstemann, Personennamen. Munich, 1968.
Fóst—Fóstbræðra Saga in ÍF 6.
 Frankfort, H. (a), Ancient Egyptian Religion: An Interpretation. New York, 1961.
 — (b), Kingship and the Gods. Chicago, 1948.
 Friedrich II, De Arte Venandi cum Avibus—Das Falkenbuch Kaiser Friedrichs II. Reproduction of Vatican MS. Pal. Lat. 1071. Commentary by C. A. Willemsen. Die Bibliophilen Taschenbücher, 152. 7th edn. Dortmund, 1991.
 Friedrich, J., Hethitisches Elementarbuch. 2 vols. Heidelberg, 1940–6.
Friedrich von Schwaben, ed. A. L. Jellinek. Berlin, 1904.
 Fritzner, J., Ordbog over det gamle norske Sprog, 2nd edn. Christiania 1886–96 (supplementary 4th vol. 1972).
 Frobenius, L., Das schwarze Dekameron: Belege und Aktenstücke über Liebe, Witz und

- Heldentum in Innerafrika*. Berlin, 1910. Selection trans. as The Black Decameron by P. and R. Ross. London, 1971.
Frostubingslög in NGL 1.
FS—Frühmittelalterliche Studien.
 Fuchs, T., 'Ueber die Bedeutung des Rigs-Mal', Mittheilungen der anthropologischen Gesellschaft in Wien 9 (1880), 142–54.
 Gantz, J., Early Irish Myths and Sagas. Harmondsworth, 1981.
 Gathorne-Hardy, G. M., A Royal Impostor: King Sverre of Norway. London and Oslo, 1956.
Gautreks Saga in Fas II.
Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, ed. J. R. R. Tolkien and E. V. Gordon. 2nd edn. rev. N. Davis. Oxford, 1967.
Genesis in ASPR 1.
 Genzmer—Edda, Skalden, Saga. Festschrift zum 70. Geburtstag von Felix Genzmer, ed. H. Schneider. Heidelberg, 1952.
 Germ: see Tacitus, Germania.
Ghv—Guðrúnarhvöt in PE 1.
Gilgamesh—The Epic of Gilgamesh, trans. N. K. Sandars. Harmondsworth, 1960. Also in Pritchard 72–99.
 Ginzburg, L., The Legends of the Jews. 7 vols. Philadelphia, 1911–38.
Gisl—Gísli Saga in ÍF 6.
 GL—Latin Culture and Medieval Germanic Europe: Proceedings of the First Germania Latina Conference Held at the University of Groningen 26 May 1989, ed. J. R. J. North and T. Hofstra. Germania Latina, 1. Groningen, 1992.
 Glob, P. V., Ard og plov i Nordens oldtid. Aarhus, 1951.
Glymdrápa by Þórbjörn hornklofi (c. 900), in Skjald B I. 20–1.
 Gottfried von Strassburg, Tristan, ed. and trans. F. Ranke and R. Krohn. 3 vols. Stuttgart, 1980. Trans. as Tristan by A. T. Hatto. Harmondsworth, 1980.
Gráfeldardrápa by Glúmr Geirason (c. 970), in Skjald B I. 66–8.
 Graff, E. G., Althochdeutscher Sprachschatz oder Wörterbuch der althochdeutschen Sprache. 6 vols. Berlin, 1834–42, with 7th vol. (alphabetical index) by H. F. Massmann, 1846.
Grágás, ed. V. Finsen. 3 vols. Copenhagen, 1852, 1879, 1883.
 Graham, I. P. E., 'The Representation of Christian Behaviour, Attitudes and Beliefs in the Prose Literature of Iceland before 1325'. D.Phil. thesis. Oxford, 1989.
 Gräter, F. D., 'Das Lied von dem finnischen Königssohn Wölunder', Idunna und Hermode: Eine Alterthumszeitung 19, 73–5, and 20, 77–9. Leipzig, 1812.
 Green, D. H., The Carolingian Lord. Cambridge, 1965.
 Greene, R. L., The Early English Carols, 2nd edn. Oxford, 1977.
 Gregory of Tours, Historiarum Libri Decem, ed. and trans. R. Buchner. 2 vols. Berlin, [1955–6].
 Grein, C. W. M., Sprachschatz der angelsächsischen Dichter. Heidelberg, 1912.
Grettis Saga Ásmundarsonar in ÍF 7.
The Grihya-sûtras. Rules of Vedic Domestic Ceremonies, trans. H. Oldenberg. Sacred Books of the East, 29–30. Oxford, 1886–92.
Grím—Grimnismál in JH II and Kuhn–Neckel.

- Grimm, J., Deutsche Grammatik IV, rev. edn. by G. Roethe and E. Schroeder. Gütersloh, 1898.
- Grip*—Gripisspá in JH II and Kuhn-Neckel.
- Griplur* in Rimnasafn I.
- Grott*—Grottasöngur in JH II and Kuhn-Neckel.
- Gróug*—Gróugaldr in Svipdagsmál.
- Guð* I, II, III—Guðrúnarkviða I, II, III in Kuhn-Neckel.
- Guðmundsson, Valtýr, and Kr. Kaalund, 'Sitte I. Skandinavische Verhältnisse', in Grundriss der germanischen Philologie III, ed. H. Paul, 2nd edn. Strassburg, 1900, 407-79.
- Guðnason, Bjarni, Um Skjöldungasögu, Reykjavík, 1963.
- Gulabingslög* in NGL I.
- Gunnell, T. (a), 'Spássiukrot? Mælendamerkingar í handritum eddukvæða og miðaldaleikrita', Skáldskaparmál 3 (1994), 7-29.
- (b), The Origins of Drama in Scandinavia. Woodbridge, 1996.
- Gunnlaugs Saga ormstungu* in ÍF 3.
- Gyðinga Saga*, ed. Guðmundur Þorláksson. STUAGNL, 6. Copenhagen, 1881.
- Gylfaginning* in SnE.
- Hák*—Hákonardrápa [Jarls Sigurðarsonar] by Hallfreðr vandræðaskáld Óttarsson (c. 986), in Davidson 448-519; also in Skjald B I. 147-8.
- Hákonar Saga Hákonarsonar* by Sturla Þórðarson, ed. Guðbrandur Vigfússon. London, 1887.
- Hákonardrápa* [góða] by Goðþormr sindri (c. 955), in Skjald B I. 55-6.
- Hákonarmál* [góða] by Eyvindr Finnsson (c. 961), in Skjald B I. 57-60.
- Hál*—Háleygjatal by Eyvindr Finnsson (c. 980), in Davidson 31-159; also in Skjald B I. 60-2.
- Haldorsen, Biørn, Lexicon Islandico-Latino-Danicum. 2 vols. Copenhagen, 1814.
- Hálfs Saga ok Hálfsrekka*, ed. H. Seelow. Reykjavík, 1981.
- Hallfreðar Saga* in ÍF 8.
- Hamð*—Hamðismál in PE I.
- Hamel, A. G. van, 'The Game of the Gods', ANF 50 (1934), 218-42.
- Hamer, A., 'Death in a Pig-sty: Snorri's Version of the Death of Hákon Jarl Sigurðarson', in GL 55-69.
- Hammarstedt, N. E., 'Kvarlevor av en Frös-ritual i en svensk bröllopslek', in Festskrift til H. F. Feilberg fra nordiske Sprog- og Folkemindeforskere på 80 Års Dagen den 6. August 1911. Stockholm, Copenhagen, and Oslo, 1911, 489-517.
- Hansen, S., 'Trællen i Rigsthula, lange Hæle', Danske Studier 9 (1912), 112-15.
- Haraldskvæði* attributed to Þorbjörn hornklofi (c. 900), in Skjald B I. 22-5.
- Hárð*—Hárbarðsljóð in JH II and Kuhn-Neckel.
- Harden, D. B., Glass of the Caesars. Milan, 1987.
- Harris, J., 'Cursing with the Thistle: Skírnismál 31, 6-8, and OE Metrical Charm 9, 16-17', Neuphilologische Mitteilungen 76 (1975), 26-33.
- Harva, U. (a), Der Baum des Lebens. Suomalaisen Tiedeakatemia toimituksia, B XVI 3. Helsinki, 1922-3.
- (b), Finno-Ugric, Siberian. The Mythology of All Races, 4. London, 1927.
- Hátatal* in SnE.

- Hatto, A. T., 'The Swan Maiden: A Folk-Tale of North Eurasian Origin?', Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London 24 (1961), 326-52. Repr. in Essays on Medieval German and Other Poetry. Anglia Germanica, 2. Cambridge, 1980, 267-97.
- Hauck, K., 'Auzon, das Bilder- und Runenkästchen', in Reallexikon s.v. Haustl—Haustlong by Þjóðólfr of Hvin (c. 900), in Skjald B I. 14-18.
- Háv*—Hávamál in JH I and Kuhn-Neckel.
- Hávarðar Saga ísfirðings* in ÍF 6.
- Havelok*, ed. G. V. Smithers. Oxford, 1987.
- Heesterman, J. C., 'The Case of the Severed Head', Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde Süd- und Ostasiens 11 (1967), 22-43. Repr. with alterations in J. C. Heesterman, The Inner Conflict of Tradition: Essays in Indian Ritual, Kingship, and Society. Chicago, 1985, 45-58.
- Heiðarviga Saga* in ÍF 3.
- Heiðr*—Saga Heiðreks konungs ins vitra, ed. and trans. C. Tolkien. London, 1960.
- Heiðreksgátur* in Heiðr.
- Heilagra Manna Sögur*, ed. C. R. Unger. 2 vols. Christiania, 1877.
- Heizmann, W. (a), 'Laukr ("Lauch") in der altnordischen Literatur, Mythologie und Heilkunde'. Hausarbeit zur Erlangung des Magister Grades an der Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität München. 1981.
- (b), Studien zur altnordischen Pflanzenkunde 1: Wildpflanzen. Dissertation. Munich, 1986.
- Heliand, Genesis*, ed. O. Behagel and W. Mitzka, 7th edn. Tübingen, 1958.
- Hellevik, A., Norsk ordbok. Oslo, 1950-.
- Hellquist, E., Svensk etymologisk ordbog, 3rd edn. 2 vols. Lund, 1948.
- Helr*—Helreið Brynhildar in Kuhn-Neckel.
- Herbert, M., 'Goddess and King: The Sacred Marriage in Early Ireland', in Women and Sovereignty, ed. L. O. Fradenburg. Cosmos: The Yearbook of the Traditional Cosmology Society, 7. Edinburgh, 1992, 264-75.
- Herodotus, [Histories], ed. and trans. A. D. Godley. 4 vols. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1920-5.
- Hesiod, Theogony, ed. M. L. West. Oxford, 1966.
- Works and Days, ed. M. L. West. Oxford, 1978.
- The Homeric Hymns and Homerica, ed. and trans. H. G. Evelyn-White. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1914. [Includes trans. of Theogony and Works and Days.]
- Heusler, A. (a), 'Heimat und Alter der eddischen Gedichte: Das isländische Sondergut', Archiv für das Studium der neueren Sprachen und Literaturen 116 (1906), 249-81.
- (b), 'Heldennamen in mehrfacher Lautgestalt', ZFDA 52 (1910), 97-107.
- (c), Altisländisches Elementarbuch, 3rd edn. Heidelberg, 1932.
- Heyman, H. E., Studies on the Havelok-Tale. Uppsala, 1903.
- HH* I, II—Helgakviða Hundingsbana I, II in JH III and Kuhn-Neckel.
- HHv*—Helgakviða Hjörvarðssonar in JH III and Kuhn-Neckel.
- Hill, T. D., 'Rígsþula: Some Medieval Christian Analogues', Speculum 61 (1986), 79-89.

- Hindemith, P., Cardillac. Mainz/Leipzig, 1926.
Hkb—Hauksbók, ed. Finnur Jónsson. See under H in Manuscripts at the beginning of the Bibliography.
Hkr—Heimskringla in ÍF 26, 27, 28.
Hlǫðskviða in Heiðr; also in Kuhn–Neckel.
HN—Historia Norvegiae in Monumenta Historica Norvegiae, ed. G. Storm. Christiania, 1880.
Höckert, R., Völuspá och Vanakulten 1. Uppsala, 1926.
Hodgkin, R. H., A History of the Anglo-Saxons 1. Oxford, 1935.
Hoffmann, E. T. A., Das Fräulein von Scuderi, in Sämtliche Werke VIII. vi. 139–99. Leipzig, 1907.
Hofgarða-Refr Gestsson (11 c.) in Skjald B I. 295–7.
Höfler, O., 'Der Sakralcharakter des germanischen Königtums', in Sacral Kingship: Contributions to the Central Theme of the VIIIth International Congress for the History of Religions, Rome, April 1955. Studies in the History of Religions, Numen Supplement 4. Leiden, 1959, 664–701.
Hofmann, D., Nordisch-englische Lehnbeziehungen der Wikingerzeit. Bibliotheca Arnarnagaeana, 14. Copenhagen, 1955.
Höfuðlausn attributed to Egill Skalla-Grimsson (c. 948), in Egil 185–92; also in Skjald B I. 30–3.
Holtmark, A. (a), Forelesninger over Völuspá: Høsten 1949. Oslo, 1949.
— (b), 'Myten om Idun og Tjatse i Tjodolvs Hauströng', ANF 64 (1949), 1–73.
Howlett, D., 'Inscriptions and Design of the Ruthwell Cross', in The Ruthwell Cross: Papers from the Colloquium Sponsored by the Index of Christian Art, Princeton University, 8 December 1989, ed. B. Cassidy. Princeton, 1992, 71–93.
Hrafnkels Saga Freysgoða in ÍF 11.
Hrafn's Saga Sveinbjarnarsonar, ed. Guðrún P. Helgadóttir. Oxford, 1987.
Hrólfr—Hrólfs Saga kraka ok kappá hans in Fas 11.
Hunke, W., 'Odins Geburt', in Genzmer 68–71.
Húsdr—Húsdrápa by Úlfr Uggason (c. 985), in Skjald B I. 128–30.
Hym—Hymiskviða in JH 11 and Kuhn–Neckel.
Hyndl—Hyndluljóð in JH 11 and Kuhn–Neckel.
IEW—Alexander Jóhannesson, Isländisches etymologisches Wörterbuch. Bern, 1956.
ÍF—Íslensk Fornrit. Reykjavík.
ÍF 1. Íslendingabók, Landnámabók, ed. Jakob Benediktsson. 1968.
ÍF 2. Egils Saga Skalla-Grimssonar, ed. Sigurður Nordal. 1933.
ÍF 3. Borgfirðinga Sögur, ed. Sigurður Nordal and Guðni Jónsson. 1938.
ÍF 4. Eyrbyggja Saga, Eiríks Saga rauða, ed. Einar Ó. Sveinsson and Matthías Þórðarson. 1935.
ÍF 5. Laxdæla Saga, ed. Einar Ó. Sveinsson. 1934.
ÍF 6. Vestfirðinga Sögur, ed. Björn K. Þórólfsson and Guðni Jónsson. 1943.
ÍF 7. Grettis Saga Asmundarsonar, ed. Guðni Jónsson. 1936.
ÍF 8. Vatnsdæla Saga, ed. Einar Ó. Sveinsson. 1939.
ÍF 9. Eyfirðinga Sögur, ed. Jónas Kristjánsson. 1956.
ÍF 10. Ljósvetninga Sögur, ed. Björn Sigfússon. 1940.
ÍF 11. Austfirðinga Sögur, ed. Jón Jóhannesson. 1940.

- ÍF 12. Brennu-Njáls Saga, ed. Einar Ó. Sveinsson. 1954.
ÍF 26, 27, 28. Snorri Sturluson, Heimskringla, ed. Bjarni Aðalbjarnarson. 1941.
ÍF 29. Agrip af Noregskonunga Sögum, Fagrskinna—Noregs konunga tal, ed. Bjarni Einarsson. 1985.
ÍF 34. Orkneyinga Saga, ed. Finnbogi Guðmundsson. 1965.
ÍF 35. Danakonunga Sögur, ed. Bjarni Guðnason. 1982.
Indiculus Superstitionum et Paganiarum in Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte, ed. H. Brunner. Leipzig, 1906.
Iolaus ed. and trans. P. Parsons, in 'A Greek Satyricon?', Bulletin of the Institute of Classical Studies 18 (1971), 53–68. Also by S. A. Stephens and J. J. Winkler in Ancient Greek Novels: The Fragments. Princeton, 1995, 358–74.
Íslb—Íslendingabók in ÍF 1.
Íslendingadrápa by Haukr Valdísarson (12 c.), in Skjald B I. 539–45.
Íslensk orðsifjabók by Ásgeir Blöndal Magnússon. Orðabók Háskólans. [Reykjavík], 1989.
Íslenskir þjóðhættir by Jónas Jónasson, sagnfræðingur frá Hrafnagili †1918, 2nd edn. Reykjavík, 1945.
Jackson, K., A Celtic Miscellany, rev. edn. Harmondsworth, 1971.
Jackson, P., 'Footloose in Archaeology', Current Archaeology 12 (1995), 466–70.
Jakobsen, A., 'Studier i Clarus Saga: Til spørgsmålet om sagaens norske proveniens'. Universitetet i Bergen Årbok, Humanistisk Serie (1963), 2.
Jansson, S. B. F., Runes in Sweden, trans. P. Foote. Värnamo, 1987.
Jente, R., Die mythologischen Ausdrücke im altenglischen Wortschatz. Anglistische Forschungen, 56. Heidelberg, 1921.
Jesch, J., Women in the Viking Age. Woodbridge, 1991.
JH—Eddadigte, ed. Jón Helgason, 1: Völuspá, Hávamál; 11: Gudedigte; 111: Heltedigte. Nordisk filologi: Tekster og lærebøger til universitetsbrug. Series A: Tekster. Copenhagen, 1951–. [In the textual notes in the present volume, JH refers to the edition of the relevant poem in Eddadigte.]
JH Vkv—Völundarkviða, ed. with commentary by Jón Helgason in Tvær kviður fornar. Reykjavík, 1962.
Jóhannesson, Alexander (a), Grammatik der urnordischen Runeninschriften. Heidelberg, 1923.
— (b), Íslensk tunga í fornöld. Reykjavík, 1924.
— (c), Die Suffixe im Isländischen. Árbók Háskóla Íslands. Reykjavík, 1927.
Jónsvíkinga Saga, ed. and trans. N. F. Blake. London, 1962.
Jónsbók. Kong Magnus Hákonssons lovbog for Island, ed. Ólafur Haldórsson. Copenhagen, 1904. Photographic reprint, Odense, 1970.
Jónsson, Arngrímur, Rerum Danicarum Fragmenta (1596), in Arngrimi Jonae Opera Latine Conscripta 1. 331–456, ed. Jakob Benediktsson. Bibliotheca Arnarnagaeana, 9. Copenhagen, 1950.
Jordanes, Getica—Iordanis, De Origine Actibusque Getarum in Iordanis Romana et Getica, ed. T. Mommsen. MGH AA v. i. Berlin, 1882 (repr. 1961).
Jost, K., Wolfstanstudien. Bern, 1950.
The Judgement Day in ASPR 111.
Judith in ASPR 114.

- Kantorowicz, E. H., The King's Two Bodies: A Study in Medieval Political Theology. Princeton, 1957.
- Karlamagnús Saga ok kappa hans*, ed. Bjarni Vilhjálmsson. 3 vols. [Reykjavík, 1950].
- Karlsson, Stefán (a), 'Aldur Hauksbókar', Fróðskaparrit, Annales Societatis Scientiarum Færoensis 13 (Tórshavn, 1964), 114-21.
- (b), 'Loki's Threat: On Lokasenna 3.4', in Twenty-eight Papers Presented to Hans Bekker-Nielsen on the Occasion of his Sixtieth Birthday, 28 April 1993. Odense, 1993, 257-66.
- Karlsson, Stefán, and Sverrir Tómasson, 'Íviðjur', Gripla 3 (1979), 227-8.
- Kelly, F., A Guide to Early Irish Law. Dublin, 1988.
- Kiil, V., 'Hliðskjálf og seiðhjallr', ANF 75 (1960), 84-112.
- King, P. D., 'The Barbarian Kingdoms', in CHMPT 123-53.
- Kirk, G. S., and J. E. Raven, The Presocratic Philosophers. Cambridge, 1957.
- Klaeber, Fr., 'Textual Notes on Beowulf', Modern Languages Notes 34 (1919), 129-34.
- Der kleine Pauly. Lexikon der Antike in fünf Bänden*. Munich, 1979.
- KLNМ—Kulturhistorisk leksikon for nordisk middelalder fra vikingtid til reformationstid*. 22 vols. Copenhagen, 1956-78.
- Knytlinga Saga* in ÍF 35.
- Kock, A. (a), 'Etymologiska anmärkingar om nordiska ord', ANF 24 (1907-8), 179-98.
- (b), 'Ordforskning i den äldre Eddan', ANF 27 (1910-11), 107-40.
- Konungs skuggsjá*, ed. L. Holm-Olsen, 2nd edn. Oslo, 1983. Trans. as The King's Mirror by L. M. Larson. New York, 1917.
- Korm—Kormaks Saga* in ÍF 8.
- Kristjánsson, Jónas, 'Stages in the Composition of Eddic Poetry', in Poetry in the Scandinavian Middle Ages. The Seventh International Saga Conference, Spoleto 4-10 September, 1988. Spoleto, 1990, 201-18.
- Kristni Saga*, ed. B. Kahle. Altnordische Saga-Bibliothek, 11. Halle, 1905.
- Kroesen, R., 'Hvessir augu sem hildingar: The Awe-Inspiring Eyes of the King', ANF (1985), 41-58.
- Kudrun*, ed. B. Symons. 3rd edn. ed. B. Boesch. Tübingen, 1954.
- Kuhn, H. (a), 'Und hvera lund', Namn och bygd 33 (1945), 171-93. Repr. in Kuhn (c) III (1972), 31-49.
- (b), 'Philologisches zur Adoption bei den Germanen', Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte 65 (Germanistische Abteilung, 1947), 1-14. Repr. in Kuhn (c) II (1971), 410-19.
- (c), Kleine Schriften: Aufsätze und Rezensionen aus der Gebieten den germanischen und nordischen Sprach- Literatur- und Kulturgeschichte. 4 vols. Berlin, 1969-78.
- Kuhn-Neckel—Edda. Die Lieder des Codex Regius nebst verwandten Denkmälern 1: Text, ed. G. Neckel, rev. H. Kuhn. 4th edn. Heidelberg, 1962.
- Kurfess, A., Sibyllinische Weissagungen. Berlin, 1951.
- Lazamon, Brut, ed. F. Madden. 3 vols. London, 1847.
- Landn—Landnámabók* in ÍF 1.
- Lang, J. T., 'Sigurd and Weland in Pre-Conquest Carving from Northern England', The Yorkshire Archaeological Journal 48 (1976), 83-94.

- Lapidge, M., 'Beowulf', Aldhelm, the 'Liber Monstrorum' and Wessex', Studi Medievali, 3^a Serie XXIII, 1 (Spoleto, 1982), 151-92.
- Larrington, C., 'What Does Woman Want?' Mær and munr in Skírnismál', Alvissmál: Forschungen zur mittelalterlichen Kultur Skandinaviens 1 (1992), 3-16.
- Laxd—Laxdæla Saga* in ÍF 5.
- Leabhar Breac Otherwise Styled Leabhar Mór Dúna Doighre. A Collection of Pieces in Irish and Latin, Compiled around the Close of the Fourteenth Century*, ed. J. O'Longan and B. O'Looney. Dublin, 1876. Also R. Atkinson, The Passions and the Homilies from the Leabhar Breac. Dublin, 1885-7.
- Leechdoms, Wortcunning and Starcraft in Early England*, ed. T. O. Cockayne. 3 vols. Rolls Series. London, 1864-6.
- Leges Burgundionum* in MGH LNG II. ii, ed. L. R. de Salis. Hanover, 1892.
- Lehmann, K., 'Die Rígsþula', in Festschrift für Julius von Amsberg. Rostock, 1904, 1-34.
- Leick, G., Sex and Eroticism in Mesopotamian Literature. London, 1994.
- Levi, C., Cristo si è fermato a Eboli. Turin, 1945; London, 1965. Trans. as Christ Stopped at Eboli by F. Frenaye. London, 1947.
- Levy, G., The Gate of Horn. London, 1948.
- Lewis, C. T., and C. Short, A Latin Dictionary. Oxford, 1880.
- Lex Ribuaria* in MGH LNG III. ii, ed. F. Beyerle, R. Buchner. Hanover, 1954.
- Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*, 3rd edn. ed. J. Höfer and K. Rahner. Freiburg in Br., 1957-.
- Leyen, F. von der, Das Märchen in den Göttersagen der Edda. Berlin, 1899.
- Liebermann, F., Die Gesetze der Angelsachsen. 3 vols. Halle, 1903-16.
- Liestøl, A., 'Runer frå Bryggen', Viking: Tidskrift for norrøn arkeologi 27 (1964), 5-53.
- Lilja* by Eysteinn Ásgrímsson (†1361), in Skjald B II. 390-416.
- Lind, E. H., Norsk-isländska personbinamn från medeltiden. Uppsala, 1921.
- Lindblad, G., Studier i Codex Regius av äldre Eddan. Lund, 1954.
- Lindow, J. (a), 'Norse Mythology and Northumbria: Methodological Notes', Scandinavian Studies 59 (1987), 308-24.
- (b), Scandinavian Mythology: An Annotated Bibliography. New York and London, 1988.
- Lindquist, I., 'En fornisländsk sjöterm skokkr', in Festschrift til Finnur Jónsson. Copenhagen 1928, 385-94.
- Lindqvist, S., Gotlands Bildsteine. 2 vols. Stockholm, 1941-2.
- Livy, ed. and trans. R. O. Foster, F. G. Moore, E. T. Sage, A. C. Schlesinger, and R. M. Geer. 14 vols. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1919-59.
- Ljunggren, K. G., 'Anteckningar till Skírnismál och Rígsþula', ANF 53 (1937), 190-232 [Sk], 54 (1938-9), 9-44 [Ríg].
- Lks—Lokasenna*.
- Lönnroth, L. (a), 'Skírnismál och den fornisländska äktenskapsnormen', in Opuscula Septentrionalia: Festschrift til Ole Widding 10. 10. 1977, ed. B. C. Jacobsen. Copenhagen, 1977, 154-78.
- (b), 'Iorð fannz æva né upphiminn. A Formula Analysis', in Speculum Norroenum 310-27.
- Loomis, R. S., Celtic Myth and Arthurian Romance. New York, 1927.

- Lorenz, G., Snorri Sturluson: Gylfaginning (Texte, Übersetzung, Kommentar). Darmstadt, 1984.
- Lorenz, K., King Solomon's Ring. London, 1952.
- LP—Sveinbjörn Egilsson, Lexicon Poeticum Antiquae Linguae Septentrionalis, 2nd edn. ed. Finnur Jónsson. Copenhagen, 1931.
- Lund, N. (ed.), Two Voyagers at the Court of King Alfred. York, 1984.
- Mabinogion* trans. G. Jones and T. Jones. London, 1949.
- Macdonell, A. A., Vedic Mythology. Grundriss der indo-arischen Philologie III. I. A. Strassburg, 1897.
- McGinn, B., Visions of the End: Apocalyptic Traditions in the Middle Ages. New York, 1979.
- McGrath, C., 'Brig', in Bibliotheca Sanctorum. Istituto Giovanni XXIII nella Pontificia Università Lateranense. 13 vols. Rome, 1963. III. 414–29.
- McKinnell, J. (a), 'Motivation in Lokasenna', SBVS 22 (1986–9), 234–62.
- (b), 'The Context of Völundarkviða', SBVS 23 (1990–3), 1–27.
- McNally, R. E., The Bible in the Early Middle Ages. Woodstock Papers, 4. Westminster, Maryland, 1959.
- MacNeill, E., 'Ancient Irish Law: The Law of Status or Franchise', Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy section C, 36 (1923), 265–316.
- McTurk, R. (a), 'Sacral Kingship in Ancient Scandinavia: A Review of some Recent Writings', SBVS 19 (1974–7), 139–69.
- (b), Studies in Ragnars Saga Loðbrókar and its Major Scandinavian Analogues. Medium Ævum Monographs, NS 15. Oxford, 1991.
- (c), 'Scandinavian Sacral Kingship Revisited', SBVS 24 (1994–5), 19–32.
- Magnússdrápa* by Arnórr Þórðarson jarlaskáld (c. 1048), in Edwards 238–73; also in Skjald B I. 311–15.
- Magnússon, Ásgeir Blöndal, 'Um ögurstund', in Sjöttú ritgerðir I. 20–9.
- Maldon—The Battle of Maldon, ed. E. V. Gordon. London, 1937.
- Málsháttakvæði* (c. 1200), in Skjald B II. 138–45.
- Mann, J., Chaucer and Medieval Estates Satire: The Literature of Social Classes and the General Prologue to the Canterbury Tales. Cambridge, 1973.
- Mann, S. E., An Indo-European Comparative Dictionary. Hamburg, 1984–7.
- Marbode of Rennes, De Lapidibus, ed. and trans. J. M. Riddle and C. W. King. Sudhoffs Archiv. Zeitschrift für Wissenschaftsgeschichte. Beiheft 20. Wiesbaden, 1977.
- Marchello-Nizia, C., 'De l'Énéide à l'Eneas: Les attributs du fondateur', Lectures médiévales de Virgile. Collection de l'École Française de Rome, 80. Rome, 1985, 251–66.
- Márquez, Gabriel García, 'Un señor muy viejo con alas enormes', Todos los cuentos de Gabriel García Márquez (1947–1972). Barcelona, 1975, 213–20. Trans. as 'A Very Old Man with Enormous Wings' in Leaf Storm and Other Stories, 105–12. Picador, 1979.
- Matsumoto, N., 'Japanese Metalworkers: A Possible Source for their Legends', in Studies in Japanese Folklore, ed. R. M. Dorson. Indiana, 1973, 147–64.
- Matthiessen, C. C., 'Um kartneglur', Skírnir 139 (1965), 127–9.
- Maurer, K., Über die Wasserweihe des germanischen Altertums. BAWA 15, no. 3, 1880.

- Maxims* I in ASPR III.
- Meaney, A. L. (a), 'Drift Seeds and the Brisingamen', Folklore 94 (1983), 33–9.
- (b), 'Women, Witchcraft, and Magic in Anglo-Saxon England', in Superstition and Popular Medicine in Anglo-Saxon England, ed. D. Scragg. Manchester, 1989, 9–40.
- MED—Middle English Dictionary, ed. H. Kurath and S. M. Kuhn. Michigan, 1954–.
- Mehl, D., The Elizabethan Dumb Show: The History of a Dramatic Convention. London, 1965.
- Meissner, R. (a), 'Ganga til fréttar', Zeitschrift des Vereins für Volkskunde 27 (1917), 1–13, 97–105.
- (b), Die Kenningar der Skalden. Bonn and Leipzig, 1921. Repr. Hildesheim, 1984.
- (c), 'Rígr', PBB 57 (1933), 109–30.
- Meringer, R., 'Wörter und Sachen II', Indogermanische Forschungen 17 (1904–5), 100–66.
- Merkelbach, R., Mithras. Königstein, 1984.
- Merlínusspá* by Gunnlaugr Leifsson (†1218), in Skjald B II. 10–45.
- MGH—Monumenta Germaniae Historica.
- MGH AA—Auctores Antiquissimi.
- MGH LNG—Leges Nationum Germanicarum.
- Mitchell, B., Old English Syntax. 2 vols. Oxford, 1985.
- Mitchell, S. A., 'For Skírnir as Mythological Model: fríð at kaup', ANF 98 (1983), 108–22.
- Moberg, L., 'Fornislandskans bið i östnordisk belysning', ANF 66 (1951), 38–51.
- Moke, D. F., 'Eroticism in the Greek Magical Papyri. Selected Studies'. Ph.D. dissertation. Univ. of Minnesota, 1975.
- Momigliano, A., 'From the Pagan to the Christian Sibyl: Prophecy as History of Religion', in The Uses of Greek and Latin: Historical Essays. Warburg Institute Surveys and Texts, 16, ed. A. C. Dionisotti, A. Grafton, and J. Kraye. London, 1988, 3–18.
- Morkinskinna*, ed. Finnur Jónsson. STUAGNL, 53. Copenhagen, 1932.
- Motz, L. (a), 'New Thoughts on Dwarf-Names in Old Icelandic', FS 7 (1973), 100–17.
- (b), 'Gerðr: A New Interpretation of the Lay of Skírnir', Maal og Minne 1981, 121–36.
- (c), 'The Chanter at the Door', Mankind Quarterly 22 (1981–2), 237–56.
- (d), The Wise One of the Mountain: Form, Function and Significance of the Subterranean Smith. Göppinger Arbeiten zur Germanistik, 379. Göppingen, 1983.
- (e), 'New Thoughts on Völundarkviða', SBVS 22 (1986–9), 50–60.
- (f), The Beauty and the Hag: Female Figures of Germanic Faith and Myth. Philologica Germanica, 15. Vienna, 1993.
- (g), 'The Host of Dvalinn: Thoughts on some Dwarf-Names in Old Icelandic', Collegium Medievale 6 (1993), 81–96.
- (h), 'The Magician and his Craft', Collegium Medievale 7 (1994), 5–31.
- Napier, A. S. (a), Old English Glosses Chiefly Unpublished. Oxford, 1900.
- (b), The Franks Casket. Oxford, 1900. Repr. from the Furnivall Celebration Volume: An English Miscellany Presented to Dr. Furnivall. Oxford, 1901.

- Neckel, G. (a), 'Hundum verpa', ANF 24 (1907-8), 199-200.
 — (b), Beiträge zur Eddaforschung. Dortmund, 1908.
 — (c), 'Altnordisch draugr in Mannkenningar', PBB 39 (1913-14), 189-200. Repr. in G. Neckel, Vom Germanentum. Leipzig, 1944, 464-74.
 Nedoma, R. (a), Die bildlichen und schriftlichen Denkmäler der Wielandsage. Göppinger Arbeiten zur Germanistik, 490. Göppingen, 1988.
 — (b), 'The Legend of Wayland in Deor', Zeitschrift für Anglistik und Amerikanistik 38 (1990), 129-45.
 Needham, J., Clerks and Craftsmen in China and the West. Lectures and Addresses on the History of Science and Technology. Cambridge, 1970.
 Nelson, J., 'Kingship and Empire', in CHMPT 211-51.
 Nennius, Historia Britonum, ed. A. Schulz ex recensione Stevenson. Berlin, 1844. Also British History and The Welsh Annals, ed. and trans. J. Morris. Arthurian Period Sources, 8. London, 1980.
 Nerman, B., 'Eddadikternas iærknasteinn', ANF 77 (1962), 48-52.
New Testament Apocrypha II, ed. W. Schneemelcher. Engl. trans. ed. R. McL. Wilson. London, 1965. (Trans. from Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, ed. E. Henecke, rev. W. Schneemelcher. 2 vols. 1963.)
 Newbold, R. F., 'Interpersonal Violence in Gregory of Tours' Libri Historiarum', Nottingham Medieval Studies 38 (1994), 3-17.
NGL—Norges gamle Love indtil 1387, ed. R. Keyser, P. A. Munch. 5 vols. Christiania, 1846-95.
 Nielsen, C., Myn fynske barndom. Copenhagen, 1948.
Njál—Njáls Saga in ÍF 12.
 Noonan, J. T., 'Power to Choose', pt. 1 (419-34) of Marriage in the Middle Ages, ed. J. Leyerle, Viator 4 (1973), 413-501.
 Nordal, Guðrún, 'Ethics and Action in Thirteenth Century Iceland: Social Obligation and Moral Behaviour in Iceland c. 1183-1264 as Represented by Sturla Þórðarson.' D.Phil. thesis. Oxford, 1987. To be published by Odense University Press, 1997, in The Viking Collection. Studies in Northern Civilization.
 Norden, E., Die Geburt des Kindes. Stuttgart, 1924.
Nordisk Kultur VI, Runorna, ed. O. von Friesen. Stockholm, 1933.
 Noreen, A., Altnordische Grammatik 1: Altisländische und altnorwegische Grammatik, 4th edn. Halle, 1923.
Norna—Gests Pátrr in Fas 1.
 North, J. R. J. (a), 'Words in Context: An Investigation into the Meanings of Early English Words by Comparison of Vocabulary and Narrative Themes in Old English and Old Norse Poetry'. Ph.D. thesis. Cambridge, 1988 (substantially published in North (b)).
 — (b), Pagan Words and Christian Meanings. Costerus New Series, 81. Amsterdam, 1991.
 Nygaard, M., Norrøn Syntax. Christiania, 1905.
OB—Oracle of Baalbek in Alexander.
Oddr—Oddrúnargrátr in Kuhn-Neckel.
OED—The Oxford English Dictionary.
 Oexle, O. G., 'Die funktionale Dreiteilung der "Gesellschaft" bei Adalberon von

- Laon: Deutungsschemata der sozialen Wirklichkeit im früheren Mittelalter', FS 12 (1978), 1-54.
 O'Flaherty, W. D., Hindu Myths. Harmondsworth, 1975.
Óláfs Saga helga—Saga Óláfs Konungs hins Helga (Den store Saga om Olav den Hellige), ed. O. A. Johnson and Jón Helgason. 2 vols. Oslo, 1941.
Óláfs Saga Tryggvasonar by Oddr Snorrason munkr, ed. Finnur Jónsson. Copenhagen, 1932.
Óláfs Saga Tryggvasonar en mesta, ed. Ólafur Halldórsson. Editiones Arnæmagnæanæ, A 1-2. Copenhagen, 1958, 1961.
Óláfsdrápa by Hallfreðr vandræðaskáld (1001), in Skjald B 1. 150-7; also ed. and trans. in M. Ashdown, English and Norse Documents Relating to the Reign of Ethelred the Unready. Cambridge, 1930.
 Oldenberg, H., Die Religion des Veda. Berlin, 1894.
 Olrik, A. (a), 'Nordisk og lappisk Gudsdyrkelse', Danske Studier 2 (1905), 39-57.
 — (b), Nordisk Aandsliv i Vikingetid og tidlig Middelalder. Copenhagen and Kristiania, 1907.
 — (c), Viking Civilization. London, 1930. Trans. of Olrik (b).
 Ólsen, B. M. (a), 'Et islandsk Stedsnavn', Aarbøger for nordisk Oldkyndighed og Historie 1881, 38-45.
 — (b), 'Strøbemærkninger til Eddakvadene', in Festskrift til Ludv. F. A. Wimmer ved hans 70 Års Fødselsdag 7. Februar 1909. Copenhagen, 1909, 150-61.
 Olsen, M., Edda- og skaldekvad: Forarbejder til kommentar 1: Hárbarðsljóð; II: Lokasenna. Avhandlingar utgitt av det norske vitenskaps-akademie i Oslo, II. hist.-filos. kl., 1960, 1 and 3. Oslo, 1960.
 O'Rahilly, T. F., Early Irish History and Mythology. Dublin, 1946.
Origo Gentis Langobardorum in Fontes Historiae Religionis Germanicae pp. 34-5, ed. C. Clemen. Berlin, 1928.
Orkneyinga Saga in ÍF 34.
 Ovid, Metamorphoses, ed. and trans. F. J. Miller, rev. G. P. Goold. 2 vols. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1984.
Pactus Legis Salicae in MGH LNG IV. 1, ed. K. A. Eckhardt. Hanover, 1962.
Padres Apostólicos, ed. Daniel Ruiz Bueno. Madrid, 1974.
 Page, R. I. (a), 'The Runic Solidus of Schweindorf, Ostfriesland, and Related Runic Solidi', Medieval Archaeology 12 (1968), 12-25.
 — (b), Life in Anglo-Saxon England. London, 1970.
 — (c), Runes. London, 1987.
 Palm, T., Trädkult: Studier i germansk religionshistoria. Skrifter utgivna av Vetenskaps-Societeten i Lund, 33. Lund, 1948.
Paris Psalter in ASPR V.
 Pàroli, T., 'Baldr's Dreams: A Poet Awaiting Vision', in Atti della Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei. Rendiconti. Serie IX. vol. III. Fascicolo 2. Rome, 1992, 137-61.
 Paulus Diaconus, Historia Langobardorum, ed. L. Bethmann and G. Waitz. MGH Scriptores Rerum Langobardorum et Italicarum, saec. VI-IX. Hanover, 1878.
 Pauly-Wissowa—Paulys Real-Encyclopädie der classischen Altertums Wissenschaft. Begun by G. Wissowa, ed. A. Pauly. 83 vols. Stuttgart, 1894—Munich, 1980.

- PBB—[Paul und Braune] Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur. Halle, 1874— and Tübingen, 1957—.
- PE 1—The Poetic Edda 1: Heroic Poems, ed. U. Dronke. Oxford, 1969.
- Pearl, ed. E. V. Gordon. Oxford, 1953.
- Peredur* in the Mabinogion.
- Perkins, R., 'An Edition of Flóamanna Saga with a Study of its Sources and Analogues'. D.Phil. thesis. Oxford, 1971.
- Philippson, E. A., Germanisches Heidentum bei den Angelsachsen. Leipzig, 1929.
- Picard, E., Germanisches Sakralkönigtum? Quellenkritische Studien zur Germania des Tacitus und zur altnordischen Überlieferung. Skandinavische Arbeiten, 12. Heidelberg, 1991.
- Piers Plowman* by William Langland, ed. W. W. Skeat. 2 vols. Oxford, 1886.
- Pindar, Fragmenta. Encomia, ed. and trans. A. Puech, Pindare iv. Paris, 1961.
- Pipping, H., Eddastudier 1, II, IV. Studier i nordisk filologi 16:2, 17:3, 20:3. Skrifter utgivna av svenska litteratursällskapet i Finland, 182, 189, 216. Helsinki, 1925, 1926, 1930.
- PL—Patrologia Latina.
- Polomé, E., 'L'Étymologie du terme germanique *Ansuz "Dieu souverain"', Études Germaniques 8 (1953), 36–44.
- Post—Postula Sögur*, ed. C. R. Unger. Christiania, 1874.
- Pritchard, J. B., Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, 2nd edn. Princeton, 1955.
- Privatbol—Valtýr Guðmundsson, Privatboligen på Island i Sagatiden*. Copenhagen, 1889.
- Procopius, [History of the Wars], ed. and trans. H. B. Dewing. 7 vols. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1914–40.
- Prophetia Sibyllae magae* in Bischoff.
- Proverbs of Alfred* in An Old English Miscellany, ed. R. Morris. EETS os 49. London, 1872.
- Pseudo-Fredegarius, Liber Historiae Francorum in Fontes Historiam Saeculorum Septimi et Octavi Illustrantes. Quellen zur Geschichte des 7. und 8. Jahrhunderts. Ausgewählte Quellen zur deutschen Geschichte des Mittelalters, 4a, ed. H. Wolfram, A. Kusternig, and H. Haupt. Darmstadt, 1982.
- Rabanus Maurus, De Universo, in PL 111.
- Ragnars Saga loðbrókar ok sona hans* in Fas 1.
- Ragnr—Ragnarsdrápa* by Bragi Boddason (mid to late 9 c.), in Skjald B I. 1–4. [On the date of Bragi, see E. O. G. Turville-Petre, Scaldic Poetry. Oxford, 1976, xxi–xxiii.]
- Reallexikon der germanischen Altertumskunde*, founded by J. Hoops; 2nd edn. ed. H. Beck et al. Berlin and New York, 1973—.
- Réau, L., Iconographie de l'art chrétien. 3 vols. in 6. Paris, 1955–9.
- Reg—Reginismál* in JH III and Kuhn–Neckel.
- Reichardt, K., 'Die Liebesbeschwörung in Fþr Skírnis', Journal of English and Germanic Philology 38 (1939), 481–95.
- Reinhard, J. R., The Survival of Geis in Mediaeval Romance. Halle, 1933.
- Reykðæla Saga* in ÍF 10.

- Rickard, T. A., Man and Metals. A History in Relation to the Development of Civilization. 2 vols. New York, 1932.
- Riddles* in ASPR III.
- Ríg—Rígsþula*.
- Rimbert, Vita Anskarii, in Fontes Saeculorum Noni et Undecimi Historiam Ecclesiae Hamaburgensis necnon Imperii Illustrantes. Quellen des 9. und 11. Jahrhunderts zur Geschichte der Hamburgischen Kirche und des Reiches, ed. and trans. W. Trillmich and R. Buchner. 2nd edn. Darmstadt, 1968.
- Rímnasafn: Samling af de ældste islandske Rimer*, ed. Finnur Jónsson. 2 vols. STUAGNL, 35. Copenhagen, 1905–12 and 1913–22.
- Ring* [c. 1499], by Heinrich Wittenwiler, ed. E. Wiessner. Leipzig, 1964.
- Robinson, P. M. W., 'An Edition of Svipdagsmál (with Analysis of 46 MSS.)'. D.Phil. thesis. Oxford, 1991.
- Roger of Howden—Chronica Magistri Rogeri de Houedene, ed. W. Stubbs. 4 vols. Chronicles and Memorials of Great Britain and Ireland during the Middle Ages (Rolls Series), 51. London, 1868–71.
- Rohde, E., Psyche: Seelencult und Unsterblichkeitsglaube der Griechen. Tübingen, 1925.
- Ross, A., Everyday Life of the Pagan Celts. London, 1970.
- Ross, A. S. C., The Terfinnas and Beormas of Ohthere, rev. M. Chesnutt. London, 1981.
- Ross, H., Norsk Ordbog: Tillæg til 'Norsk Ordbog' af Ivar Aasen. Christiania, 1895–1913.
- Ruggerini, M. E., Le invettive di Loki. Rome, 1979.
- Runciman, W. G., 'Accelerating Social Mobility: The Case of Anglo-Saxon England', Past and Present: A Journal of Historical Studies 104 (1984), 3–30.
- Rune Poem* in ASPR VI; also in Dickens.
- Ruodlieb in Frühe deutsche Literatur und lateinische Literatur in Deutschland (800–1150)*, ed. with German trans. B. K. Vollmann. Bibliothek des Mittelalters, ed. W. Haug, 1. Frankfurt am Main, 1991, 388–551, 1306–1406 (Kommentar).
- Rushworth Matthew in The Four Gospels in Anglo-Saxon, Northumbrian, and Old Mercian Versions, ed. W. W. Skeat. 4 vols. Cambridge, 1871–87.
- RV—The Rig Veda: An Anthology*, trans. W. O'Flaherty. Harmondsworth, 1981.
- Rygh, O., Norske Gaardnavne. 19 vols. Kristiania, 1897–1936.
- Saga Ædriks Konungs af Bern*, ed. C. R. Unger. Christiania, 1853.
- Sahlgren, J., 'Förbjudna namn', Namn och bygd 6 (1918), 1–40.
- Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa—The Śatapathabrāhmaṇa, According to the Text of the Mādhyandina School*, trans. J. Eggeling. 5 vols. Sacred Books of the East, 12, 26, 41, 43, 44. Oxford, 1882–1900.
- Sauvé, J., 'The Divine Victim: Aspects of Human Sacrifice in Viking Scandinavia and Vedic India', in J. Puhvel, Myth and Law among the Indo-Europeans. Berkeley, 1970, 173–92.
- Sawyer, P. H., Kings and Vikings: Scandinavia and Europe AD 700–1100. London, 1982.
- Saxo—Saxo Grammaticus, Saxonis Gesta Danorum, ed. J. Olrik and H. Ræder. 2 vols. Copenhagen, 1931.
- Saxo, History—Saxo Grammaticus, The History of the Danes Books I–IX, ed. H. R. Ellis Davidson and P. Fisher. 2 vols. (Text; Commentary). London, 1979, 1980.
- SBVS—Saga Book of the Viking Society for Northern Research.

- Schier, K. (a), 'Die Erdschöpfung aus dem Urmeer und die Kosmogonie der Völuspá', in Märchen, Mythos, Dichtung: Festschrift zum 90. Geburtstag Friedrich von der Leyens am 19. August 1963, ed. H. Kuhn and K. Schier. Munich, 1963, 303-34. Repr. in Schier (c), 15-52.
- (b), 'Die Húsdrápa von Úlfr Uggason und die bildliche Überlieferung altnordischer Mythen', in Minjar og menntir: Afmælisrit helgað Kristjáni Eldjárn, 6. desember 1976, ed. Guðni Kolbeinsson. Reykjavík, 1976, 425-43. Repr. in Schier (c), 80-101.
- (c), Nordlichter: Ausgewählte Schriften 1960-1992, ed. U. Sterath-Bolz, S. Wurth, and S. Geberl. Munich, 1994.
- Schilling, H. L., Paul Hindemiths "Cardillac". Beiträge zu einem Vergleich der beiden Opernfassungen—Stilkriterien im Schaffen Hindemiths. Literarhistorisch-Musikwissenschaftliche Abhandlungen, 17. Würzburg, 1962.
- Schmeller, J. A., Bayerisches Wörterbuch, 2nd edn. ed. G. K. Frommann. 2 vols. Munich, 1872-8.
- Schneider, H., Germanische Heldensage. 2 vols. Grundriss der germanischen Philologie, 10. Berlin und Leipzig, 1928-34.
- Schröder, F. R., 'Das Symposium der Lokasenna', ANF 67 (1952), 1-29.
- Schultz, A., Das höfische Leben zur Zeit der Minnesinger 1, 2nd edn. Leipzig, 1889.
- Schwab, U., 'Nochmals zum ags. "Waldere" neben dem "Waltharius"', PBB (Tübingen) 101 (1979), 229-51, 347-68.
- See, K. von (a), 'Das Alter der Rígsþula'. Acta Philologica Scandinavica 24 (1957), 1-12. Repr. in von See (f), 84-95.
- (b), 'Zwei eddische Preislieder: Eiríksmál und Hákonarmál', in Festgabe für Ulrich Pretzel, zum 65. Geburtstag dargebracht von Freunden und Schülern, ed. W. Simon, W. Bachofer, and W. Dittmann. Berlin, 1963, 107-17. Repr. in von See (f), 318-28, with addendum 522-5.
- (c), Altnordische Rechtswörter: Philologische Studien zur Rechtsauffassung und Rechtsgesinnung der Germanen. Hermaea 16. Tübingen, 1964.
- (d), 'Rígsþula Str. 47 und 48', PBB (Tübingen) 82 (1960), 318-20. Repr. in von See (f), 96-8.
- (e), 'Probleme der altnordischen Spruchdichtung', ZFDA 104 (1975), 91-118. Repr. in von See (f), 45-72.
- (f), Edda, Saga, Skaldendichtung: Aufsätze zur skandinavischen Literatur des Mittelalters. Skandinavische Arbeiten, 6. Heidelberg, 1981.
- Seip, D. A., Norsk språkhistorie til omkring 1340. 2nd edn. Oslo, 1955.
- Senchus Mor in Ancient Laws and Institutes of Ireland*.
- Sexstefja* by Þjóðólfr Arnórsson (†1066), in Skjald B 1. 339-46.
- SG—Sijmons, B., and H. Gering, Die Lieder der Edda. Kommentar. Halle, 1927.
- Shetelig, H., and H. Falk, Scandinavian Archaeology, trans. E. V. Gordon. Oxford, 1937.
- Sievers-Brunner—E. Sievers, Altenglische Grammatik, rev. K. Brunner, 2nd edn. Halle, 1951. 3rd edn. Tübingen, 1965.
- Sigrdr—Sigrdrifumál* in JH III and Kuhn-Neckel.
- Sigsk—Sigurðarkviða in skamma* in Kuhn-Neckel.
- Sigurðardrápa [Hlaðajarls Hákonarsonar]* by Kormakr Ógmundarson (c. 960), in Skjald B 1. 69-70.

- Siikala, A.-L., The Rite Technique of the Siberian Shaman. Folklore Fellows Communications, 220. Helsinki, 1978.
- Simpson, J., 'Mímir: Two Myths or One?', SBVS 16 (1962-5), 41-53.
- Sjötu ritgerðir helgaðar Jakobi Benediktssyni*, ed. Einar G. Pétursson, Jónas Kristjánsson. 2 vols. Reykjavík, 1977.
- Skáldatal in Edda Snorra Sturlusonar* III. Copenhagen, 1887.
- Skáldskaparmál* in SnE.
- Skjald—Den norsk-islandske Skjaldedigtning*, ed. Finnur Jónsson. 4 vols. Copenhagen and Christiania, 1912-15.
- Skjöldunga Saga* in ÍF 35.
- Skm—Skírnismál*.
- Skm—Modell—Skírnismál. Modell eines Edda-Kommentars* by K. von See, B. La Farge, E. Picard, and M.-C. Hess. Heidelberg, 1993.
- SMHD—Scriptores Minores Historiae Danicae Medii Aevi*, ed. M. C. Gertz. 2 vols. Copenhagen, 1917-20.
- SN—Sigurður Nordal, Völuspá: Gefin út með skýringum. Árbók háskóla Íslands, 1922-3. Reykjavík, 1923. Rev. edn. 1952. Trans. B. S. Benediktz and J. McKinnell as Völuspá. Durham and St Andrews Medieval Texts, 1. Durham, 1978.
- SnE—Snorri Sturluson, Edda*, ed. Finnur Jónsson. Copenhagen, 1931.
- Sneglu-Halla Þáttir* in ÍF 9.
- Snorrason, Oddr—see Óláfs Saga Tryggvasonar.
- SO—Sibylline Oracles* in Kurfess.
- Söderberg, B. (a), 'Till tolkning av några dunkla passager i Lokasenna', Scripta Islandica 35 (1984), 43-86.
- (b), 'Formelgods och eddakronologi', ANF 101 (1986), 50-86.
- (c), 'Lokasenna—egenheter och ålder', ANF 102 (1987), 18-99.
- Solinus, C. Iulii Solini Collectanea Rerum Memorabilium, ed. T. Mommsen. Berlin, 1864.
- Solomon and Saturn* in ASPR VI.
- Sonat—Sonatorrek* by Egill Skalla-Grimsson (c. 960), in Egil 246-56; also in Skjald B 1. 34-7.
- Sprla Þáttir* in Flat 1. 275-83, and in Fas 1.
- A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy*, ed. S. Radhakrishnan and C. A. Moore. Princeton, 1957.
- Sozomenus, Hermias, Kirchengeschichte [AD 324-439], ed. J. Bidez and G. C. Hansen. Berlin, 1960. Trans. C. D. Hartrauft, The Ecclesiastical History of Sozomen, in H. Wace and P. Schaff, A Select Library of Nicene and post-Nicene Fathers of the Christian Church. 2nd series, vol. II. Oxford, 1890.
- Speculum Norroenum: Norse Studies in Memory of Gabriel Turville-Petre*, ed. U. Dronke, Guðrún P. Helgadóttir, G. W. Weber, and H. Bekker-Nielsen. Odense, 1981.
- Steenstrup, J., Danmarks Riges Historie, Copenhagen, [n.d.].
- Steinmeyer-Sievers—Die althochdeutschen Glossen. Collected and ed. E. von Steinmeyer and E. Sievers. 5 vols. Leipzig, 1879-1922.
- Steinsland, G. (a), 'Treit i Völuspá', ANF 94 (1979), 120-50.
- (b), 'Antropogonimytten i Völuspá: En tekst- og tradisjonskritisk analyse', ANF 98 (1983), 80-107.

- Steinsland, G. (c), Det hellige bryllup og norrøn kongeideologi: En analyse av hierogamimotivet i Skirnismál, Ynglingatal, Háleygjatal og Hyndluljóð. [Oslo], 1991.
- (d), 'Religionskiftet i Norden og Völuspá 65', in Nordisk Hedendom: Et Symposium, ed. G. Steinsland, U. Drobin, J. Pentikäinen, and M. Sørensen. Odense, 1991, 335–48.
- Stenton, F. M. (a), 'The Thriving of the Anglo-Saxon Ceorl, a Hitherto Unpublished Lecture Delivered in the University of Cambridge on 27 April 1958', in Preparatory to 'Anglo-Saxon England': Being the Collected Papers of Frank Merry Stenton, ed. D. M. Stenton. Oxford, 1970, 383–93.
- (b), Anglo-Saxon England, 3rd edn. rev. M. Stenton and D. Whitelock. Oxford, 1971.
- Stephens, J., 'Weland and a Little Restraint: A Note on Deor 5–6', Studia Neophilologica 41 (1969), 371–4.
- Sternberg, L., 'Divine Election in Primitive Religion', Conférence faite au XIIe Congrès International des Américanistes Göteborg, 20–26 Août, 1924. Göteborg, 1925, 472–512.
- Sticca, S., The Latin Passion Play: Its Origins and Development. New York, 1970.
- Stjórn*, ed. C. R. Unger. Christiania, 1850.
- Storms, G., Anglo-Saxon Magic. The Hague, 1948.
- Strabo, The Geography of Strabo, ed. and trans. H. L. Jones. 8 vols. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1917–32.
- Ström, F. (a), On the Sacral Origin of the Germanic Death Penalties, trans. D. Burton. Stockholm, 1942.
- (b), 'Poetry as an Instrument of Propaganda: Jarl Hákon and his Poets', in Speculum Norroenum 440–58.
- (c), 'Hieros gamos-motivet i Hallfreðr Óttarssons Hákonardrápa och den nordnorska jarlavärdigheten', ANF 98 (1983), 67–79.
- Strömbäck, D., Sejd: Textstudier i nordisk religionshistoria. Lund, 1935.
- Strong, E. (a), Apotheosis and Afterlife. London, 1915.
- (b), 'The Stuccoes of the Underground Basilica near the Porta Maggiore', Journal of Hellenic Studies 44 (1924), 65–111.
- STUAGNL—Samfund til Udgivelse af Gammel Nordisk Litteratur, Copenhagen.
- Sturl (a)—Sturlunga Saga, ed. Jón Jóhannesson, Magnús Finnbogason, and Kristján Eldjárn. 2 vols. Reykjavík, 1946.
- Sturl (b)—Sturlunga Saga, ed. Örnólfur Thorsson. 3 vols. Reykjavík, 1988.
- Svarfdæla Saga* in ÍF 9.
- Sveinsson, Einar Ólafur, Íslenskar bókmenntir í fornöld. [n.p.] (Allmenna bókafélagið), 1962.
- Svipdagsmál* in Robinson 60–85; Bugge (a), 338–51.
- Tacitus, Germania, in Opera Minora, ed. M. Winterbottom and R. M. Ogilvie. Oxford, 1975.
- Histories, Annals, ed. and trans. C. H. Moore and J. Jackson. 5 vols. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1925–37.
- Táin Bó Cúalnge*, trans. J. Dunn, London, 1914.
- Thomas Saga Erkihyskups*, ed. C. R. Unger. Christiania, 1869.

- Thompson, E. A., 'The Visigoths in the Time of Ulfila', Nottingham Medieval Studies 5 (1961), 3–32.
- Thompson, S., Motif-Index of Folk-Literature, rev. edn. 6 vols. Copenhagen, 1955–8.
- Thurneysen, R. (a), Die irische Helden- und Königsage. Tübingen, 1921.
- (b), Irishes Recht II: Zu den unteren Ständen in Irland. Abhandlungen der preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Phil.-hist. Kl. 1931, no. 2, 67–87.
- Tolkien Studies—English and Medieval Studies Presented to J. R. R. Tolkien on the Occasion of his Seventieth Birthday*, ed. N. Davis and C. L. Wrenn. London, 1962.
- Tolley, C. (a), 'A Comparative Study of some Germanic and Finnic Myths'. D.Phil. thesis. Oxford, 1993.
- (b), 'The Shamanic Séance in the Historia Norvegiae', Shaman 2 (1994), 135–56.
- (c), 'The Mill in Norse and Finnish Mythology', SBVS 24 (1994–5), 63–82.
- (d), 'Vǫrðr and gandr: Helping Spirits in Norse Magic', ANF 110 (1995), 57–75.
- (e), 'Heimdallr and the Myth of the Brisingamen in Húsdrápa', Tijdschrift voor Skandinavistiek 17/1 (1996), 83–98.
- (f), 'Beowulf's Scyld Scefing Episode: Some Norse and Finnish Analogues', Arv 52 (1996), 7–48.
- Tómasson, Sverrir (a), Formálar íslenskra sagnaritara á miðöldum. Reykjavík, 1988.
- (b), 'Formáli málfræðiritgerðanna fjögurra í Wormsbók', Íslenskt mál 15 (1993), 228–31.
- Torp, A., Nynorsk etymologisk Ordbok. Kristiania, 1919.
- The Towneley Plays*, ed. A. C. Cawley and M. Stevens. EETS ss 13, 14. Oxford, 1994.
- Trier, J., 'Heide', Archiv für Literatur und Volksdichtung 1 (1949), 63–103.
- Turville-Petre, E. O. G., Myth and Religion of the North: The Religion of Ancient Scandinavia. London, 1964.
- Turville-Petre, J., 'On Ynglingatal', Medieval Scandinavia 11 (1978–9), 48–67.
- UD (a)–(l): see Dronke, U. (a)–(l).
- Vafþ—Vafþrúðnismál* in JH II and Kuhn–Neckel.
- Vatnsdæla Saga* in ÍF 8.
- Velent—Velents Þáttir in Þiðrek* 1.
- Vell—Vellekla* by Einarr Helgason skálaglamm (c. 986), in Davidson 160–447; also in Skjald B I. 117–24.
- Vestrfararvísur* by Sigvatr Þórðarson (1025–6), in Skjald B I. 226–8.
- Viennot, O., Le Culte de l'arbre dans l'Inde ancienne: Textes et monuments brâhmaniques et bouddhiques. Annales du musée Guimet, Bibliothèque d'Études, 59. Paris, 1954.
- Víga-Glúm—Víga-Glúms Saga* in ÍF 9.
- Vigfússon—Guðbrandur Vigfússon and R. Cleasby, An Icelandic–English Dictionary, 2nd edn. rev. W. A. Craigie. Oxford, 1957.
- Virgil, Georgics, in Virgil 1, ed. and trans. H. R. Fairclough. Loeb Classical Library. Rev. edn. London, 1978.
- Vkv—Völundarkviða*.
- Vǫðu—Brands Þáttir* in ÍF 10.
- Vǫls—Vǫlsunga Saga*, ed. and trans. R. G. Finch. London, 1965.
- Vǫlsa Þáttir* in Flat II. 331–6.

- Vries, J. de (a), 'Ginnungagap', Acta Philologica Scandinavica 5 (1930-1), 41-66.
 Repr. in de Vries, Kleine Schriften, 1965, 113-32.
 — (b), The Problem of Loki. Folklore Fellows Communications, 110. Helsinki, 1933.
 — (c), 'Rood-Wit-Zwart', Volkskunde 2 (1942), 1-10.
 — (d), 'Bemerkungen zur Wielandsage', in Genzmer 173-99.
 — (e), 'Über das Wort "Jarl" und seine Verwandten', La Nouvelle Clío 6 (1954), 461-9.
 — (f), 'Der Mythos von Balders Tod', ANF 70 (1955), 41-60.
 — (g), 'Das Königtum bei den Germanen', Saeculum 7 (1956), 289-309.
 — See also under AEW, AL, AR.
Vsp—Vþuspá.
 Wadstein, E., 'Alfer ock älvor: En språkligt-mytologisk undersökning', in Uppsala-studier tillägnade Sophus Bugge på hans 60-åra födelsedag den 5 januari 1893. Uppsala, 1892, 152-79.
 Walde, A., Vergleichendes Wörterbuch der indogermanischen Sprachen, ed. and rev. J. Pokorny. 2 vols. Berlin and Leipzig, 1927-32.
Waldere in ASPR III.
 Waley, A., The Nine Songs: A Study of Shamanism in Ancient China. London, 1955.
 Weber, G. W. (a), Wyrð: Studien zum Schicksalsbegriff der altenglischen und altnordischen Literatur. Frankfurter Beiträge zur Germanistik, 8. Bad Homburg, Berlin, Zürich, 1969.
 — (b), 'Die Christus-Strophe des Eilífr Goðrúnarson', ZFDA 99 (1970), 87-90.
 Webster, L., 'Stylistic Aspects of the Franks Casket', in The Vikings, ed. R. T. Farrell. London and Chichester, 1982, 20-31.
 Wesche, H., Der althochdeutsche Wortschatz im Gebiete des Zaubers und der Weissagung. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache, 1. Halle, 1940.
 Wessén, E. (ed.), Äldre Västgötalagen. Stockholm, 1954.
Wessobrunn Prayer in Braune, Althochdeutsches Lesebuch, no. XXIX; with trans. and commentary in Bostock, no. IX.
Widsið: A Study in Old English Heroic Legend, ed. R. W. Chambers. Cambridge, 1912.
 Williams, G. H., The Norman Anonymous of 1100 A.D. Harvard Theological Studies, 18. Cambridge, Mass., 1951.
 Williamson, C. (ed.), The Old English Riddles of the Exeter Book. Chapel Hill, 1977.
 Wilson, D., The Vikings and their Origins. London, 1970.
 Wilson, R. M., The Lost Literature of Medieval England, 2nd edn. London, 1970.
 Wolf, A., Gestaltungskerne und Gestaltungsweisen in der altgermanischen Heldendichtung. Munich, 1965.
 Wood, I. N., 'Ripon, Francia and the Franks Casket in the Early Middle Ages', Northern History 26 (1990), 1-19.
 Wortmann, D., 'Neue magische Texte', Bonner Jahrbücher 168 (1968), 85-102.
 Wulfstan (a)—The Homilies of Wulfstan, ed. D. Bethurum. Oxford, 1957.
 — (b)—Wulfstan: Sammlung der ihm zugeschriebenen Homilien, ed. A. S. Napier. Berlin, 1883.
Yng—Ynglinga Saga in Hkr 1.
 Young, J., 'Does Rígsþula Betray Irish influence?', ANF 49 (1933), 97-107.

- Ytal—Ynglingatal* by Þjóðólfr of Hvin (c. 900), in Ynglinga Saga; also in Skjald B 1. 7-14.
 Zahan, D., 'White, Red and Black: Colour Symbolism in Black Africa', in The Realms of Colour. Eranos Jahrbuch, 41. Leiden, 1974, 365-96.
ZFDA—Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum.
 Zimmer, H. R., Myths and Symbols in Indian Art and Civilization, ed. J. Campbell. Bollingen Series, 6. New York, 1946.
Þáttur af Ragnars Sonum in Fas 1.
Þiðrek—Þiðreks Saga af Bern, ed. Guðni Jónsson. 2 vols. Reykjavík, 1951.
Þórfinnsdrápa by Arnórr Þórðarson jarlaskáld (c. 1060), in Edwards 274-317; also in Skjald B 1. 316-21.
Þórgeirsdrápa by Þórmóðr Bersason Kolbrúnarskáld (c. 1025), in Skjald B 1. 256-60.
Þórsdr—Þórsdrápa by Eilífr Goðrúnarson (c. 990), in Davidson 520-665; also in Skjald B 1. 139-44.
Þórsteins Þáttur bæjarmagns in Fas III.
Prym—Prymskviða in JH II and Kuhn-Neckel.
Pulur in Skjald B 1. 656-80.